

CRIME IN ENGLAND

VOL. I.

FACSIMILE OF A CARICATURE ON A ROLL (ROTULUS JUDEORUM, A.D. 1233)
IN THE PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE.

Representing

Isaac, the great Jew of Norwich, and chief creditor of the Abbot and Monks of Westminster ;
Mosse Mokke, a Jew, who was hanged for clipping the coin ;
Avegay, a Jewess, who practised usury ; with devils in attendance.

(See pp. 189-191.)

London : SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15 Waterloo Place.

HISTORY OF CRIME

IN ENGLAND

ILLUSTRATING THE

CHANGES OF THE LAWS IN THE PROGRESS OF CIVILISATION

WRITTEN FROM THE PUBLIC RECORDS AND OTHER CONTEMPORARY EVIDENCE

BY

LUKE OWEN (PIKE,) M.A.

OF LINCOLN'S INN, BARRISTER-AT-LAW

AUTHOR OF

'THE ENGLISH AND THEIR ORIGIN, A PROLOGUE TO AUTHENTIC ENGLISH HISTORY' ETC.

VOL. I.

From the ROMAN INVASION to the ACCESSION of HENRY VII.

LONDON

SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE

PREFACE.

SIR MATTHEW HALE, one of the many great lawyers who have shown an ardent love of history, and who have earnestly laboured to discover historical truth, bequeathed his manuscripts to the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn. I was not fully acquainted with the extent and value of his collection until I had drawn out the plan of the present work, and brought together the greater part of my materials. Fortunately, however, I ascertained, before I began to write, that there are in the Hale MSS. a considerable number of references to records, with abstracts conveniently placed under various heads, which have a direct bearing upon the History of Crime. According to the terms of Hale's will, not even a member of Lincoln's Inn is permitted to consult the MSS. without express permission, and for that permission I have to offer the Benchers my best thanks.

Some of Hale's references and abstracts are taken, word for word, from ancient calendars formerly in the Tower of London; others are apparently the result of independent research among the records themselves; but in every instance in which I have made use of the collection I have also consulted the original document. In my own notes, I have not only indicated the record from which any fact is taken, but wherever I was directed to it by Sir Matthew Hale, I have carefully acknowledged the obligation.

In the Library of the Inner Temple there is a great collection of transcripts from records, known as the Petyt MSS. ; and I am much indebted to the Benchers of that Honourable Society for the kindness and courtesy with which they granted me access to their historical treasures.

To the Librarians of both Inns I must also express my thanks for the ready aid given in answer to every question.

Except for the purpose of expressing thanks where thanks are due, a preface to a history is almost unnecessary. The book should speak for itself: for its method in its text—for its accuracy in its references. But, as I have indicated the sources from which I have drawn my materials, in a manner which has, I believe, not been previously adopted, a few words of explanation may, perhaps, be not altogether useless. The reader is in every case referred not from the text to the note, but from the note to the text, and the whole of the notes are placed at the end of the volume.

My reason for this innovation is not that I regard the references to original sources as of little importance, but that I regard them as of sufficient importance to be kept distinct from the narrative and the views of the Author. To know where the historian has sought his facts is to possess a very useful guide to his character as a historian; and this knowledge, according to the plan of the present work, can be most readily attained by simply looking to the end of the volume. A very short time will suffice for any competent critic to learn whether the information upon which the history is founded is second-hand, or—as I venture to submit it should be in every history—first-hand.

Numbers of foot-notes are like the parentheses of one who relates something by word of mouth, and who frequently interrupts his narrative with such remarks as ‘But I ought to have mentioned,’ or ‘I forgot to say,’ or ‘This is really a fact, as you may easily ascertain by reference.’ It is difficult to understand why a habit which shows want of art in a story-teller has long been permitted to the historian, who should not omit to say that which, in his opinion, ought to be said, and who should, at least, possess the faculty of expressing in his text the distinction between an established fact and a mere possibility. Some authors have before adopted the expedient of placing their notes at the end, but so far as I am aware, they have all made their reference from the text to the note by attaching a number to some word in the text. This, though an improvement, still bears a likeness to a clumsy talker’s repeated interruption of himself with the statement that he is telling the truth.

It seems better and more simple to announce, once for all, that no assertion for which there is not good warrant has wittingly been made in the text. All who wish to know what the evidence is have but to look in the side-notes of the Appendix, at the end of the volume, for the number of the page which contains the statement to be verified. They will there, I trust, find what will convince them.

In this volume it would have been almost impossible to follow the ancient plan of giving references by any kind of indication in the text. In many places, especially in the fourth chapter, almost every sentence in a paragraph has records adduced in its support, and the distraction of the reader's eye and attention by ever-recurring numbers would have been most tedious.

There is, too, an advantage in the method now adopted which seems to be very much in favour of historical truth. It is a very stringent check upon the writer. A number attached to a word in the text, and corresponding with the same number attached to a description of a manuscript or a book, is very apt to mislead, as all are aware who have verified the references of preceding authors. There is commonly nothing to show whether a reference applies to a sentence, a paragraph, or a series of paragraphs; and thus the real foundation of an important assertion often remains in obscurity. No such uncertainty can exist when the plan upon which the references are made involves a statement of the fact or facts established by every document mentioned.

To a reader who may cast his eye over the Appendix before looking at the text, there may possibly seem to be a disregard of chronological order. Every chapter, except the fourth, is, so to speak, a wide stage, on which the characters come and go—not, I trust, without good reason, but without regard to the method of annalists who make a mere inventory of the events which have occurred in each year. When a period displays a number of features which are little less marked at the end than at the beginning, it seems to be the historian's duty to show how and why they have this power of sustaining themselves, and how they are connected one with another. These remarks would, perhaps, be unnecessary if the references were suppressed, but are necessary as an introduction to the references considered by themselves. The Appendix is in support of a history in which the method is essentially chronological, but which advances period by period instead of year by year.

A very large portion of the text is founded on records which have never been published, and many of which have, in all probability, never before been consulted for any historical purpose. These are described in the notes by their technical names; and anyone who chooses can inspect them for himself at the Public Record Office. In every case, too, in which I have availed myself of collections of printed records, as, for instance, Rymer's 'Fœdera,' I have given a reference not only to the printed book, but to the source from which the document is taken. A reference to Rymer with this precaution, is never, as it might otherwise be, a second-hand reference to a chronicle, but always a reference to an original record, made accessible by means of the printing-press.

A greater space than is occupied by the text would have been required to print in full all those hitherto unpublished evidences to which reference has been made. To reprint at length what is in print elsewhere, has not, in any case, appeared necessary, because no collection of mere extracts from chronicles will prove that the history agrees in the main with the context of the extracts, as well as with the extracts themselves. A few remarkable documents, however, will be found in the notes, and among them the indictment of Oldcastle, as enrolled in the King's Bench. The important points in which this original record differs from the transcript taken into Parliament by the Chief Justice of England, and afterwards enrolled on a Roll of Parliament, have also been indicated, and are well worthy of note. A historian might well believe, as historians seem to have believed hitherto, that every Roll of Parliament is an original authority, but this particular roll contains a reference to a King's Bench record, which, upon verification, reveals a striking discrepancy. Such are the difficulties with which an author has to contend who would arrive at historical truth.

In full reliance upon records, I have, here and there, departed from the account given of some matters in the legal text-books ; and though I cannot hope to have altogether escaped error, I trust I shall not be accused of being in the wrong, simply because I have placed confidence in the best evidence I could find.

In order to avoid needless repetitions, I have purposely reserved various matters for future treatment. The records have been my guide in determining what should be considered the chief characteristics of every age.

The present volume ends with a well-marked period of English history, and has been brought out by itself at the suggestion of gentlemen who are far more able than

I am to judge how a work should be published. The materials for the rest of the history have, however, been collected ; the plan of the whole was drawn out before any of it was written, and some progress has already been made with the text of the second volume.

L. OWEN PIKE.

LONDON : May 1873.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY.

FROM THE ROMAN INVASION TO THE NORMAN CONQUEST.

	PAGE
The scope, the sources, and the difficulties of the work	1
Teutonic origin of our Criminal Law	7
Advantage of looking beyond the Teutonic invasion	7
General view of Roman Conquest and Roman Culture	8
It is uncertain what was the condition of Britain before the Roman invasion	10
Alleged punishments and human sacrifices before the Roman occupation	10
Roman punishments in the Arena	12
Value set upon human life by the Romans	13
The dark side of the Roman Criminal Law	13
The origin of the more cruel punishments	14
Brighter side of the Roman Criminal Law : gradation of punishments	15
Justice tempered with mercy under the Empire	16
Regard for personal liberty	17
Participation of the Provinces in the benefits of Roman Law	18
Compassion shown under the Empire to the children of criminals	19
Improvement in the condition of slaves after the adoption of Christianity	19
Treatment of slaves by Romans and barbarians	20
Social grades under the Empire : the tillers of the soil	21
The land-owners	21
Duties of the land-owners : the colonial courts	22
Recognition of personal property : growth of commerce	22
Britain enjoyed the full benefit of Roman civilisation	23
Her loss when the Romans abandoned her	24
A journey in Roman Britain	25
Splendour of a villa in Britain under the Empire	26
Culture of its occupants	29
General sense of security in Roman Britain	29
The dangers from without : the barbarism which was to come	30
Roman and other superstitions	32

CONTENTS.

Introduction of Christianity into Britain	35
The superstitions with which it was infected	36
Their wide diffusion	37
Their appearance after the mission of Augustine	38
The crime of Witchcraft and the Church	40
Customs introduced by the Teutonic settlers	41
Setting a price upon human life : the blood-feud	41
Wide diffusion of the custom	42
Stage of human progress in which it exists	43
It was inseparable from Teutonic Conquest	44
It was introduced anew into Britain by the Teutonic invaders	45
It survived the re-establishment of Christianity	46
It was associated with the practice of compounding for penances	47
Distinctions of class in the Criminal Laws	48
Brutality culminating in the punishment of slaves and women	51
Primitive Trials	52
The Ordeal	53
Compurgation	55
Its demoralising effects	55
Its relation to Trial by Jury	56
Police-system: The Guild compulsory and voluntary: the Peace-Pledge	57
The Tithing and the Hundred	58
Full development of the system under the Danes	60
Its inherent weakness	60
The Guilds and the Compurgators	61
The Guilds and the Assassins	62
Trade-guilds and the towns	64
Importance of the history of Towns in the History of Crime	66
Disputed origin of Towns in England	66
Roman names : the Chesters	67
Teutonic names : the Boroughs	70
The origin of the Roman Chester and of the Teutonic Borough the same	71
Relation of the Town to the Shire	71
Contrast between the primitive Teuton and the Town-builder	73
The Teuton in possession of a coinage	74
The Teuton in possession of walls, bridges, and roads	75
Change in his views with regard to land-tenure	76
Land held in common by every primitive tribe	76
The Teutonic Mark and Tribe	77
Stage between tenure in common and tenure in severalty	77
Common land in England	78
Origin of the private land-holder	78
Acquisition by force the first and long the best title to land	79
Its connection with the right of private war	80
Origin of Private Jurisdictions	82
Their diffusion in town and country	83
Municipal Jurisdictions	83
Feebleness of the higher Jurisdictions	84
General view of society in England from the sixth century to the eleventh	85

Popular veneration for Alfred 'the Great'	85
Ferocious spirit in the Laws of Alfred, Canute, and the Confessor, as in the laws of earlier date	86
Persistence of the same general conditions of life through six centuries	87
Partisanship the only bond which held men together	88
The Slave and the Churl	89
The custom of wife-buying	90
Its nature	91
The Church was at first compelled to accept it	91
The Clergy afterwards used their influence to abolish it	91
Character of the Clergy	93
Description of the inhabitants of England by Lanfranc	94

CHAPTER II.

FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST TO THE THIRD CRUSADE. ENGLAND
AT THE END OF THE TWELFTH CENTURY.

First effects of the Conquest	96
Continuity of History	97
Punishments before and after the Conquest	97
The Normans and the Englishry	98
Humanity of Lanfranc	100
Lanfranc and the scenes around him	100
Feudalism and the Church	102
Separation of Ecclesiastical and Secular Jurisdictions	103
Growth of the Privilege of Clergy	104
Religious and military ferment throughout Europe	105
Policy of the Conqueror : Domesday Book	106
The King's Court ; the Exchequer ; Fines for Crimes	107
First indications of the Eyre or Circuit	108
Attempts to effect improvements continually thwarted	109
Good government, in the modern sense, impossible	109
Henry I. and the Coiners	110
Anarchy during Stephen's reign ; private Mints	111
Unification of the Kingdom, the traditional policy of the Conqueror's family	113
This policy was distasteful to the Clergy	114
The quarrel of Becket with Henry II. ; the rival Jurisdictions	115
Murder of Becket	117
Plans of legal improvement under Henry II.	118
Origin of the Grand Jury	120
Compurgation and the Wager of Law	123
Development of the Jury-system under Henry II. ; the Grand Assise	124
Partisanship and Perjuries of Jurors	126
Link between the Grand Assise and the later Juries in criminal cases	127
Attempts to counteract the evils of Partisanship	128
Attempts to secure Uniformity of Procedure	129

General design of the Assise of Clarendon, the Assise of Northampton, and the Inquest of Sheriffs	130
Improved legal Education	133
General aversion to changes in the Law	134
Opposition to the Eyres	135
Meaning and effect of this hostility	136
Position of the Englishry in the rural districts	137
The towns not yet able to exert their influence for good	139
General state of Society in the 12th century	140
Crimes prevalent in London	141
The Court as described by an Archdeacon	142
Venality of Justices, Sheriffs, and other Courtiers.	143
Loaded dice	145
Character of the Clergy according to contemporaries	146
The Clergy of the two provinces exchange blows at Westminster	148
Value of Relics	149
Stealing of Relics sanctioned by a Religious House	150
The Clergy and the Poor	151
Charity	153
Appearance of Heretics in England	154
Inhuman treatment of them	155
Brigands described as Heretics	156
Source of the prevailing Barbarism	157
Position of the Jews in England	157
Scene on the Coronation-day of Richard I.	159
Massacre of the Jews in London	160
" " at York	161
" " at Lynn, Stamford, and Lincoln	162
The Crusades according to Romance	163
Historically they illustrate the moral condition of Europe	164
Treacheries of the Crusaders	165
Character of Richard Cœur de Lion	167
His popularity	167
Remote advantages of the Crusades	168
The Age of Chivalry illustrated by the Ordinances made for the Crusaders	168

CHAPTER III.

FROM THE THIRD CRUSADE TO THE YEAR BEFORE THE BLACK DEATH.

The period exhibits remarkable contrasts	170
The towns become quit of the Murder-fine	171
They obtain other privileges	172
Their Guilds	173
They recover from the effects of the Conquest sooner than the rural districts	174
They are in danger of reverting to the old forms of barbarism	175
They begin to be represented in the Legislative Body	176

Fusion of opposing principles	178
First effects of town influence	178
Proportion of town population to rural population	179
Relative magnitude of the towns	181
First effects of Commerce upon the distribution of the population	182
Scantiness of the population as a whole	183
Narrow-mindedness among the townsmen and other classes	183
This was illustrated in the treatment of the Jews	184
Envy excited by them ; their superior knowledge of Commerce	185
They have various frauds attributed to them	186
The story of the Jew of Bristol	186
Hostility of the Clergy to the Jews	187
The Clergy desired their expulsion	188
The Abbot and Monks of Westminster and others of the Clergy were in debt to them	189
A contemporary caricature of them	190
The Jews and the ' Pope's money-changers '	192
The Jews bribe the Justices	192
Their privileges are restricted	193
Absurd accusations against them	194
Two hundred and eighty of them hanged in London	195
Cruel expulsion of the Jews from the kingdom	196
Its advantage to the King and the Clergy	197
Its bearing upon a crime attributed to the Abbot and Monks of West- minster	198
The great robbery at the Royal Treasury	199
Commission of Enquiry	199
Indictment and trial of the Sacristan, Sub-prior, and Monks	200
Conduct of the Monks before and after conviction	201
Contrast between the improvements in the Laws and the lawlessness of the people	203
The Ordeal abolished through the influence of the Church	204
The Judicial Duel : an instance	204
The Petty Jury taking the place of the Ordeal, and, in part, of the Duel	206
Indictments and Appeals : Party-swearing	208
Standing mute : the ' prison forte et dure '	210
Effects of the punishment of mutilation	211
An illustration	212
Gradual substitution of other punishments	213
The Forest Laws	213
Mitigation of them	215
Slow effects of legislation upon the tone of society	216
Provisions for the Conservation of the Peace	218
The Statute of Winchester	220
Changes in the method of administering Justice	221
Origin of Justices of the Peace	223
The Law of Treason	223
Illustration from the case of Piers Gavaston	224

	PAGE
Illustration from the cases of the Despensers	225
The punishment for High Treason : the reasons assigned for it	226
Treason and the right to depose a Sovereign	226
Accusations of Treason from corrupt motives	228
Illustration : the Earl, the Friar, and the Spirit	228
Spread of corruption ; attempts to stay it	229
The Ordinance and Oath of the Justices	230

CHAPTER IV.

ENGLAND IN THE YEAR BEFORE THE BLACK DEATH.

Scene at Dover	232
Sanctuary-men	232
The seamen of the Cinque Ports	233
Journey from Dover to London	234
Arrival in London	235
Scenes in the Markets	237
Public Punishments in the Streets	237
The Highway from London to Westminster : the Lepers	238
Westminster Abbey : its Law-suits	239
State of the Roads	240
Difficulties of travelling : aspect of the country	241
Dens of Robbers	242
Organised Brigandage	242
Attacks at Fairs and Markets	243
Bristol in the hands of Brigands	243
Plunder taken alike from the King and his subjects	244
Murder of the King's Sergeant-at-Arms	245
State of the Marches towards Scotland	246
Crime and the right of private war	246
Acts resembling Brigandage committed by Knights and by the Clergy	247
They are illustrated by the subsequent Statutes against forcible entry	249
Close connection of the first barbarous taking of land by force, the 'forcible entry' in assertion of a right, and open brigandage	249
Crimes deliberately committed by Knights and Priors at the head of a military force	250
The township of Worcester asserts a jurisdiction against the Prior by force of arms	252
Simple murders distinguished from greater offences	253
Comparison of past and present totals	254
The women hardly less brutal than the men	255
Conflicts with the Ministers of Justice : Bloodshed in Court	257
Partisanship : Intimidation of prosecutors and suitors	257
Armed resistance to the Collectors of Taxes	258
Knights errant, brigands, and 'noble savages' are not incapable of the meaner crimes	259

Crimes on the border-land between the 'chivalrously' venial and the unchivalrously mean	260
Dishonesty characteristic of the 'Age of Chivalry'	261
Commerce at its birth infected by Fraud	262
Intimate connection of Force and Fraud	263
Treachery of Knights and Merchants	264
Evasion of Duties	265
Importation of False Coin	265
English Manufacturers of False Coin	266
False charges connected with the Coinage	267
Dishonesty at the Mints	268
Forgery; counterfeit seals; false pretences	269
Forged writs and returns in Courts of Law	270
Forgery used as an aid to Brigandage	271
Forged Pardons	272
Forgery of Exchequer Bills	273
Mode of raising money upon forged Exchequer Bills	274
Forgeries of Charters in Religious Houses	275
Forgeries committed by Sheriffs	276
Partiality and general corruption of Sheriffs and other officers	277
Juries packed by Sheriffs	278
Corruption in the Court of King's Bench	279
Forgery by Counsel; taking fees from both parties to a suit	280
Deceptions practised in the Ecclesiastical Courts	281
Bribery among the Judges: the Chief Justice of England convicted	282
Ill effects of these bad examples	283
Reluctance of Juries to convict	284
Common Receivers of Felons and Goods	285
Approvers; their usual fate; the reasons for it	286
Prisoners forced by torture to become Approvers	287
Conduct of Approvers after making their accusations	288
Prosecution by Appeal; Impunity of Criminals	289
Hardships suffered by injured accusers	290
Facilities for the escape of criminals	292
Advantages to criminals from the imperfect adoption of surnames	293
Readiness with which pardons were granted	294
Pardon for a fraudulent burial	296
Benefit of Clergy	297
Light thrown by the Criminal Records upon the great religious movements of the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries	298
Proceedings upon the claim of Privilege of Clergy	298
The Class to which the Privilege was allowed	300
The Advantages secured by the Privilege	301
Jealousies excited by it: Clerks always convicted when tried	302
Unpopularity of the Clergy	303
Forcible entries into Churches: scandalous scenes	304
Open warfare between the secular and ecclesiastical authorities	305
Misapplication of revenues attached to religious houses	305
Familiarity of the Clergy with violence and bloodshed	307

	PAGE
Want of respect among the Clergy for members of their own body	308
Sacrilege a common offence	308
The circumstances which moulded the minds of Wycliffe, Chaucer, and the author of 'Piers Plowman's Vision'	309
Their works, with the Public Records, complete the picture of the Age.	311
The Court : the state of education	312
Effects of the adoption of the English Language by the Court	314
The year before the Black Death a representative year ; the Age of Chivalry at its best	317
Scenes to be witnessed by the survivors of the Plague	319
Object of the present chapter	321

CHAPTER V.

FROM THE BLACK DEATH TO THE ACCESSION OF HENRY VII.

The social effects of every Great Plague	322
Effects of the Black Death in England	323
The Statute of Labourers	323
The Bond and the Free	323
Sketch of the history of Villenage	324
Improvement in the condition of slaves after the Norman Conquest	325
The slave becomes an inferior villein	325
The villeins not the only labourers	326
Discontent among the villeins : its causes	327
Growth of a class of free labourers	327
The coming changes accelerated by the Plague	328
They were accelerated also by religious discontent	329
Claim of the villeins to be free	330
Legal aspect of their case	330
The passions of the lower classes inflamed by the poll-tax	331
Wat Tyler's rebellion	332
Aims of the rebels	333
London in the hands of the mob : Slaughter of the Lawyers	333
Destruction of documents and treasures	334
Brutal orgies of the mob	335
Imitation of public executions : fate of the Archbishop of Canterbury	336
Immediate effects of the rebellion	337
Progress of religious discontent	338
Charges against William of Wykeham and other Bishops	338
Tone of morals among public men	339
Appropriations : the Clergy, the Tithes, and the Poor	341
Agitation against the Clergy : popular Songs	342
The Clergy denounce the crime of heresy : Policy of Henry IV. and Henry V.	343
The writ for 'the burning of a heretic'	344
Execution of Sautre	344
Arrest of Lollards throughout the kingdom	345
Sir John Oldcastle	346

Oldcastle's indictment as enrolled in the King's Bench : the erasure	346
His outlawry	347
The sentence pronounced upon him	347
Enrolment of the proceedings on the Rolls of Parliament : the discrepancies	348
Forgery or carelessness?	348
Oldcastle's death not to be attributed to the clergy alone	350
Aims of Oldcastle, Blake, and Acton	351
Alliance of the clergy with the upper classes of the laity	351
Charges of witchcraft : study pronounced disgraceful to lay-people	352
Connection between charges of heresy and charges of witchcraft	353
The Maid of Orleans	354
Search for sorcerers in England	355
The charge of witchcraft as a political engine : the Duchess of Gloucester	356
Her trial	356
Her condemnation and penance	357
The Duchess of Bedford and her daughter, Queen Elizabeth, suspected of witchcraft	358
Charge of witchcraft against Thomas Burdett	360
The Duke of Clarence charged with having imputed witchcraft to Edward IV. himself.	361
Accusation of witchcraft against Jane Shore.	362
A strange coincidence : introduction of printing at a time when charges of witchcraft became most prominent	363
Attempt to explain the contrast : the towns and the country	363
Degree of progress indicated by the invention of printing	364
Improvements in the manufacture of paper	365
Paper a substitute for parchment : increase of correspondence	366
Interchange of uses between the pen and the seal	367
Writing, printing, sealing, and forgery	368
The improvement of paper and the invention of printing due to the spirit of commerce	369
The commercial spirit, and the spirit of private war	370
Country robbers and town thieves	371
The Knight's complaints against the townsman	371
The social pretensions of town and country	373
All mental culture traced to the towns	373
The towns and the fugitive villeins	376
The Trade Guilds : position of a guildsman	377
Employers and employed : their early relations	378
New grouping of classes	380
The religious or social guilds : their relation to earlier and later times	381
Recapitulation : progress made in the fifteenth century	383
Obstructions to progress : evasion of the Mortmain Laws by the clergy	384
Incongruous union of the Roman Law with the Feudal Land-laws	384
Absence of improvement in legal procedure ; the jurors still witnesses ; perjuries	386
Treatment of the accused : the 'peine forte et dure'	387

	PAGE
Continued lawlessness : remarkable sentiment of Chief Justice Fortescue	388
The 'Great Hearts' of the English : Chivalry in its best aspect	389
The 'Battle of Treason' described by a Royal Armourer	389
Single Combat and the spirit of private war	392
Single Combat might have been useful in national disputes ; challenge of Richard II. to the French King	393
Private war and forcible entry : Statute against forcible entry	394
The Statute ineffectual : private jurisdiction	395
Statutes against retainers and liveries also ineffectual	396
The force of ancient custom and the force of material progress evenly balanced	397
Charges of 'Scandalum Magnatum' associated with the growth of a new class	398
Case of Sibille and the Earl of Oxford	399
Case of Cavendish and Michael de la Pole, the Chancellor	399
Fabrication of false charges : case of Ferriers and the beggar	400
Charge against English Knights of surrendering Fortresses for bribes	401
The cry of 'We are betrayed'	402
Charges of corruption against William de la Pole	402
His fate	403
Absence of improvement in the tone of rival parties ; atrocious deeds of bloodshed	404
Murder of a Duke of Gloucester	404
Attainder after death	406
Similar fate of another Duke of Gloucester	406
Effect of surrounding circumstances upon the character : Richard II. an illustration	407
Effects of secret crimes : personators of murdered kings	408
Richard III. and 'Chivalry'	409
'Chivalry' and the condition of women	409
The Mistresses of Kings : Alice Perers	410
Mothers and Daughters : chastisement of a young lady	411
The only improvement in the condition of women was in the towns	411
The towns were affected by the lawlessness of the country	412
A brawl in Westminster Hall	412
Attack on a Lord sitting in the Star Chamber	413
Armed Retainers riding into the towns to impede the course of Justice	413
Mutilation still a common offence	414
General want of tenderness	414
Brutal conduct of soldiers bound for foreign service	415
Horrors of the Civil Wars	415
Less security and less civilisation in England at the accession of Henry VII. than in Britain before the Romans departed	417
But there was hope of a higher civilisation through free labour	418
Prospect of a more settled government	419
The resistance of ignorance and brutality still to be stubborn and long	419
General sketch of society at the end of the Middle Ages	420
The transition into the modern state of society remains to be treated	421

APPENDIX.

REFERENCES AND NOTES.

	PAGE
General Remarks	423

REFERENCES AND NOTES TO CHAPTER I.

Evidence for a description of the appearance of various criminals	425
Evidence of ancient British customs : estimate of its value	425
Note upon Roman punishments in the arena	426
Note on the use made of the Theodosian Code in the Text	426
Reference concerning 'Laesa Majestas,' or High Treason	426
References concerning the use of the more cruel punishments by the Romans	426
Laws showing the gradation of punishments under the Empire	426
Evidence concerning the use of Torture by Romans and English	427
Merciful provisions in Roman Laws	427
Roman laws to secure liberty of the person	427
Roman laws to protect the provincials	427
Laws in favour of the wives and children of criminals	428
Laws concerning slaves	428
Evidence of the Theodosian Code concerning the owners and culti- vators of land, and concerning the constitution of Colonial Courts	428
Proof that these Courts existed in Britain	429
Roman companies or guilds : proof that they existed in Britain	429
Evidence for the description of a journey in Roman Britain	429
Evidence for the description of a villa in Roman Britain	430
Note on the condition of women under the Empire	430
Note on the position of the Roman Governor in Britain	431
Note (with reference) on the imperial edict against teaching barbarians to build ships	431
Note on the diffusion of superstitions	431
Evidence concerning superstitions from Horace, Tacitus, Pliny, and the Theodosian Code	432
Evidence from the early Fathers of the superstitions with which Chris- tianity must have been infected when first introduced into Britain	432
Note on the statement that it is uncertain what superstitions were intro- duced by the Teutonic invaders	433
Evidence of the superstitions in England after the mission of Augus- tine	433
Note on the orthography of pre-Norman names	434
Evidence of the early superstitions in England (continued)	434
Evidence of ancient German manners and customs	436

Evidence that the blood-feud was common to various races	436
Evidence that it was revived and continued by Teutonic conquest . .	437
Note on the first appearance of England in history	437
References concerning the commutation of penances	437
References to laws showing the distinction between freemen and slaves in England	437
References to laws concerning the punishment of slaves and freemen in England	437
References concerning the Ordeal	438
References concerning compurgation, and its relation to trial by jury .	438
References concerning the Guild as a part of the Police-system . .	438
References concerning the Guild, the Tithing, the Hundred, and the Manor.	439
References concerning voluntary Guilds	440
References concerning assassination	440
Evidence of Domesday concerning Guilds of Burgesses	440
Note on the names and origin of towns and shires	440
Evidence of the ancient German mode of life	441
References concerning the use of coin by the Teutonic invaders . .	441
Note on the use of roads and walls by the Teutonic invaders . .	441
Note and references concerning Teutonic and primitive land-tenure, and the early tenure of land in England	441
Note and references concerning the 'Mark'	442
Note on private jurisdictions in the country	442
References to Domesday, &c., concerning private jurisdictions in towns	442
Note on municipal jurisdictions	443
Note (with references) on the moots or courts in existence before the Conquest, and on the proceedings in them	444
Note on the general character of the pre-Norman laws	444
Note on the persistence of the same general conditions of life . .	445
Note on slavery in England	445
Note and references concerning the practice of wife-buying . . .	445
Note on the character of the clergy	446
Note on watch and ward	446
Reference to Lanfranc's description of England, with evidence in con- firmation	446

REFERENCES AND NOTES TO CHAPTER II.

Note on the use of the word 'Englshry' in the text	447
Reference to Henry of Huntingdon concerning native views of the Nor- man Conquest	447
References concerning the law of murder immediately after the Con- quest	447
References concerning the sack of a monastery by a Bishop	447
Reference to the letter of Gregory VII. on wife-buying	447
Reference concerning mutilation under the Conqueror	448
Note on the introduction of trial by combat	448
Note on the character of Lanfranc	448

	PAGE
Note on the introduction of feudalism into England	448
Reference concerning Gregory's encroachments	449
Reference to the law separating ecclesiastical from secular jurisdiction	449
Note on Domesday Book and the Great Rolls of the Exchequer	449
References concerning the punishment of coiners	449
References concerning events in Stephen's reign	449
References concerning the murder of Becket and the events which preceded it	449
References to Public Records, Glanville, &c., concerning legal changes under Henry II., and their relation to previous and subsequent laws, and to trial by jury	450
References to records concerning the Wager of Law	450
Note on the spelling, &c., of Latin documents	451
Note on the study of the Roman Law in England	452
Note (with references to the Great Rolls of the Exchequer, &c.) upon the early operation of the system of Eyres	452
Note (with references to the Great Rolls of the Exchequer, the 'Dialogus de Scaccario,' Glanville, Bracton, the Statutes, &c.) concerning the end of the distinction between Norman and Englishman	453
References concerning the crimes in London and other towns in the twelfth century	456
References concerning the Court of Henry II.	456
References concerning the character of the clergy in the twelfth century	456
References concerning the clerical brawl when the Primacy was in dispute	456
References concerning the value and stealing of relics	456
Note and references to Records, &c., concerning the support of the sick and poor in the twelfth century	457
Note and references concerning the doctrines and treatment of the first heretics in England	457
References concerning the Jews in England in the twelfth century	457
References concerning the coronation of Richard I. and the subsequent massacres of the Jews	457
References concerning the first two Crusades and the morals of the Crusaders	458
References concerning the character of Richard I., and the Ordinances for the punishment of Crusaders in the third Crusade	458

REFERENCES AND NOTES TO CHAPTER III.

References to Charters, &c., concerning the privileges acquired by the Towns during the first two centuries after the Conquest : freedom from the murder-fine, &c.	459
Note and references to Records, Glanville, &c., concerning the Guilds or Communes of towns at the end of the twelfth century and beginning of the thirteenth	460
References to Charters, &c., concerning freedom acquired by fugitive

	PAGE
villeins after a year's sojourn in a chartered town, and concerning burgage-tenure	461
References to Charters concerning the growth of the representative principle in towns	462
References to Records, &c., concerning early English Commerce after the Conquest	462
Reference to a Roll showing the distribution of population under Edward II.	462
References to Records, &c., showing the position of the Jews before Pandulf became Legate	463
References to Records showing that the Clergy were in debt to the Jews, and desired their expulsion	463
References to Records, in explanation of a caricature of Jews, A.D. 1233 (frontispiece)	464
References concerning the 'Pope's Money-changers'	464
References concerning bribery of Justices by Jews	464
References showing a change in the position of the Jews	464
Statute of the Jewry, &c.	464
References concerning charges against the Jews, executions, &c.	464
Note and references to Records concerning the expulsion of the Jews	465
References to Records concerning the appropriation of the Jews' goods	465
Note and references concerning the value of 100,000 l. (stolen from the Royal Treasury under Edward I.)	466
Note and references to Records, &c., concerning the proceedings after the Great Robbery at the Royal Treasury	466
References concerning the later Ordeal and its abolition	467
Reference to a Record concerning the Trial by Battle	467
References concerning the growth of the Petty Jury after the abolition of Ordeal	467
References to Records, &c., concerning the 'prison forte et dure,' and standing mute	468
References to Records concerning mutilation, &c. (Edward I.—Edward III.)	468
References concerning the Forest Laws	469
References concerning the aims and privileges of the Barons	469
References concerning the 'Conservation of the Peace,' the Division of the Courts, the Justices of Trailbaston, the origin of Justices of the Peace, &c.	469
Reference to the Statute of Treasons	470
References to Records, &c., concerning the cases of Gavaston and the Despensers	470
Reference to an early Record concerning the punishment for High Treason	470
References to Records, &c., concerning the deposition and murder of Edward II.	471
Reference to a Record concerning 'the Earl, the Friar, and the Spirit'	471
References to Records, &c., concerning corruption and attempts to check it	471

REFERENCES AND NOTES TO CHAPTER IV.

	PAGE
Evidence concerning the scene at Dover	472
Evidence from Records concerning Sanctuary and Abjuration of the Realm	472
References to Records, &c., concerning the seamen of the Cinque Ports	472
References to Records concerning a journey from Dover to London in the fourteenth century	473
References concerning scenes in London	473
References concerning the road from London to Westminster, Westminster Abbey, and scenes there.	473
References to Records showing the state of the roads, &c.	473
References to Records concerning Dens of Robbers	474
References to Records concerning Brigandage, the capture of Bristol, the want of respect for royal authority, &c.	474
References to Records concerning the state of the Marches, &c.	475
References concerning the acts of private war, brigandage, &c., committed by townsmen, knights, and clergy	475
References to Records concerning the proportion of homicides to population in 1348	476
References to Records concerning the character and position of women in 1348	476
References to Records concerning attacks upon Justices, and brawls in Court	477
References to Records concerning intimidation of suitors, resistance to tax-collectors, &c.	477
References to Records concerning forcible marriage and abduction	477
References to Records concerning speculation by the Master of the Horse and other knights	477
References to Records concerning the treachery of merchants and knights	477
References to Records concerning evasion of duties, the importation of false coin, and the manufacture of it in England	478
References to Records concerning false accusations of importing base coin, and concerning the Mints	478
References to Records concerning counterfeit seals, forged letters, writs, returns, &c.	478
References to Records concerning forgery as an aid to brigandage	478
— — — forged pardons	479
— — — the forgery of Exchequer Bills	479
— — — the forgeries of Charters	479
— — — forgery by Sheriffs, packing of juries, &c.	479
— — — corruption in the Court of King's Bench, &c.	480
— — — forgery and double-dealing by counsel	480
— — — an Archdeacon's Court	480
— — — the acceptance of bribes by Chief Justice Thorpe, &c.	480
— — — the reluctance of jurors to convict	480
— — — receivers	481
— — — Approvers and their Appeals	481
— — — other Appeals	481

	PAGE
References to Records concerning the difficulty of identification of names	481
— — — pardons, false and genuine	482
Note and references concerning Benefit of Clergy, the manner of claiming it, and its effects	482
References to Records concerning the conviction of clerks, and the unpopularity of the clergy	483
References to Records concerning forcible entries upon Rectories, &c.	484
— — — the Excommunication of Sheriffs' Officers	484
— — — the mismanagement of charities, &c.	484
— — — homicide by parsons	484
— — — fugitive monks	484
— — — Sacrilege	485
References to Chaucer and the 'Vision'	485
References to Records concerning the state of Education in the fourteenth century	485
Note and evidence concerning the Black Death and its importance	485

REFERENCES AND NOTES TO CHAPTER V.

Reference to the Statute of Labourers	486
Evidence for the history of slavery and villeinage: a deed of sale in full	486
References to Records showing the beginnings of free labour	487
— concerning the doctrine of equality	487
— to Records illustrating the claim of the villeins to be free	487
— to Records, Chronicles, Songs, &c., for the details of Wat Tyler's rebellion	487
Note on 'Impeachment,' and references to Records concerning the charges against William of Wykeham, the Bishop of Norwich, &c.	488
References to Records concerning appropriations, misapplication of tithes, and general dissatisfaction with the Clergy	488
References to Statutes, &c., showing the policy of Henry IV. and Henry V.	489
References concerning the Writ and Statute for burning heretics	489
— the execution of Sautre, and persecution of other heretics	489
— to Records of the proceedings against Oldcastle, Blake, and Acton	490
The Indictment of Oldcastle, Blake, and Acton, copied verbatim from the 'Coram Rege' Roll, and compared with the transcript exhibited in Parliament	490
Note and reference concerning the 'unchivalrousness' of Lollardism	493
References to Records, &c., concerning the Maid of Orleans, and the search for Witches under Henry IV. and Henry VI.	493
— — — the Trial and Penance of the Duchess of Gloucester	494
— — — the imputations against the Duchess of Bedford and her daughter	494
References to Records, &c., concerning Burdett and Clarence	494
— — — Jane Shore	494
Note and references concerning the introduction of printing, its relation to ancient seals, the growth of paper-manufacture, &c.	494

	PAGE
References concerning the ancient use of seal and pen	495
— — Printing and Commerce in the reign of Edward IV.; Caxton, the Poles, &c.	496
Statutes showing the frauds practised in the fifteenth century	496
Note on town life and country life	496
References concerning trade guilds, the relations of capital and labour, and the progress of commerce in the fifteenth century	497
Records concerning the social or religious guilds	498
Statutes relating to 'Uses'	498
References concerning legal procedure, the 'peine forte et dure,' &c., • in the fifteenth century	498
Treatise on the 'Battle of Treason'	499
Note on the challenge of Richard II. to the French King	499
References concerning forcible entry and private jurisdiction in the reign of Richard II.	499
Statutes and Records concerning liveries, retainers, &c.	499
Statutes and Records concerning 'Scandalum Magnatum'	499
Records concerning corrupt surrender of fortresses, &c.	500
Evidence of murders of Dukes of Gloucester	500
References to Records concerning the deposition of Richard II. and the false personation of kings after death	500
References concerning the position of women in the fifteenth century	501
Record (in full) of a brawl in Westminster Hall	501
References to Records concerning armed forces in law courts, mutila- tions, misdeeds of soldiers, &c.	502
References concerning the Wars of the Roses	502
Note on the value of statements in the preambles of Statutes	503
Evidence of the state of society towards the end of the fifteenth century	503

Errata.

Page	23	5 lines from top, del the second 'to be'
„	31	12 , bottom, for In read To
„	173	5 , „ after 'as' insert a comma
„	192	14 , top, for objects read object
„	210	12 , bottom, after 'for' insert a comma
„	211	7 , „ after Though del it may be said that
„	213	6 , „ after as insert a
„	226	14 , top, after is del the comma
„	252	6 , bottom, for and laid them waste read which they laid waste
„	262	15 , „ after 'that' insert a comma
„	301	7 , „ insert the comma after 'that' instead of before
„	303	7 , „ after 'relatives' del the comma
	346	second side-note, for erasures read erasure
	360	last line, after that del the comma
	429	lines 20 and 23 from bottom, for the S in 'Signiferorum' read L.
	430	16 lines from top, after comparison del the comma
	441	third side note, for Notes read Note
	445	10 lines from top, for Lives read Life
	490	6 „ „ after relate insert to
	495	22 „ „ after remains del the comma

A HISTORY OF CRIME IN ENGLAND.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY.

FROM THE ROMAN INVASION TO THE NORMAN CONQUEST.

WHAT is Crime? Whence come the Criminals? Have we inherited from the darker ages a malady which is gradually becoming extinct, or are we ourselves indulging in new and more evil habits, which will corrupt still further the life-blood of posterity? Is it true that where wealth accumulates men decay, that our forefathers were better men than we, and that, as we strain our eyes back into the past, we can see in history that golden age of which poets in all countries have prattled? Savages who were noble, knights who were blameless in their lives and fearless in death, kings who lived only for their people, peoples contented with their rulers, plenty, happiness, and widespread virtue were, according to some philosophers, the blessings which the world once enjoyed, in spite even of the fall of Adam.

To such a picture as this our prisons and dockyards, filled by an ever-flowing stream of new offenders, or of criminals who are whirled back by successive eddies again and again to their former place, present a hideous contrast. There may be seen the deliberate murderer, with steel-blue eye and square jaw and set lips, patient as a beast of prey and not less cruel, marking with calmly vindictive glance all who come to see him in his cage, biding' the time for his release, resolved that his next spring shall be at once more stealthy and more deadly than his last. There, with feeble frame and puny head, is he who sheds blood he knows not why, who is cursed with too much cunning to escape punishment as an idiot, blessed with too little sense to act discreetly. There is the thief by profession, with ears projecting outwards as though to catch the first sound of the pursuing thief-taker, and with unquiet eyes, which seem to dread detection even in the act of looking. There are the evil-doers of a higher class—each differing from his fellows because they have reached the same goal by somewhat different paths. But conspicuous among them all is the perjurer, from his resemblance to convicts of another stamp. With an unstable mien, like that of the habitual pilferer, he often has a bolder and more shameless air. His is often the massive neck, broad behind as the head itself, which is common to the most brutal among homicides, and which indicates a vigorous heart and a full flow of blood. He needs all his strength, even though destitute of feeling, to stand unabashed and be ever ready with a new lie when lie after lie has been detected and exposed. He may be observed only too often in every law-court, drawing himself together, with a characteristic but almost imperceptible gesture, for a new effort against truth as often as some unexpected shaft has grazed his impenetrable hide. Sooner or later he finds his way to gaol, which, however, he may enter for an offence of some other kind than perjury, and so become undistinguishable in the great mass of iniquity.

Such characters as these, and many others not unlike them, are unhappily within the every-day experience of the gaol-chaplain and the warder. They are often described as a reproach to our civilisation, and have baffled again and again the ingenuity of philanthropists. But can civilisation with justice be held wholly responsible for all that exists side by side with it? Is civilisation in any respect a disgrace to the civilised? Has its progress been only in a vicious circle? Is its end to be suicide? To such questions there is no answer except in history—not the history of a decade or a century, but the complete history of our nation. The causes must be studied in their operation through many long ages. To seek for them within the narrow limits of a modern period would be as vain as to judge whether the tide is ebbing or flowing from the marks of only two consecutive waves on the sea-shore. In that truth lies the justification (and with it some of the greatest difficulties) of the present undertaking.

In the attempt to write a History of Crime, a field is entered which has never previously been explored. The history of civilisation has been written again and again; the manners and customs of past ages have been depicted by authors whose mastery of style compensated, so far as compensation was possible, for paucity of materials; the changes in our laws, the development of our literature, the increase of our arts, and the growth of our science, have been narrated in almost every detail and discussed from almost every point of view. History has long ceased to be a bare chronicle of battles lost and won, of the rise and fall of dynasties, and of the intrigues of statesmen. But in the reaction against that useless method of recalling the past which exalted a date as a thing to be remembered for its own sake, and appraised a man's intellect by the number of disconnected facts with which it was stored, there has arisen a danger of erring in an opposite direction. The history which states the facts and omits the causes has been in some degree supplanted by the history which generalises upon causes where the facts are insufficient. Civilisation is a great whole made up of so many different parts that unless workers can be found who will be content to investigate its constituent elements with some minuteness its progress can never be thoroughly understood.

It is surely a paradox that there have long been many 'Histories of Civilisation,' and not one 'History of Crime.' The different opinions entertained at different times of similar actions, the varying amount of respect shown for human life and for property, the effects of ignorance and superstition upon the nature and the number of offences and upon the laws intended for their repression, the relation between political convulsions and social disorganisation belong essentially to the history of civilisation. These and a variety of minor details connected with the history of crime have hitherto been either passed over in silence, or dismissed in a few dogmatic sentences, which might be true by chance, but were not founded on certain information. An Oates has often been held up to execration as a disgrace to humanity, a Bacon alternately described as sinned against or sinning; but none have set themselves to enquire what causes in the far-off past had aided in the development of a Bacon or an Oates, how far they have now been modified, and whether it is possible that we may ourselves transmit any of them to our descendants.

We congratulate ourselves, not without good cause, upon improvements in the administration of justice. The integrity of our judges has long been so far above suspicion that we have almost ceased, for want of a contrast, to realise the value of a Bench without reproach, or the miseries of a country in which the interpreters of the law have lost the confidence of the people. It is only by a careful study of the past that we can know how immeasurably better, in this respect at least, is our condition than that of our forefathers. It is only by comparison of the past with the present that we can discern what grounds we have for hope in the future.

If Crime has received but little attention, even in histories of civilisation, it is probably because historians were not aware of the existence of sufficient materials to illustrate the subject. The subject could hardly have been considered either unimportant or uninteresting in itself. The means of effecting a comparison between one age and another, in their criminal and social aspects, cannot be found in sufficient abundance in printed books. Crabbed manuscripts, often dirt-stained and half obliterated by damp, written in a hand and in a language with which the classical scholar is not familiar, must be laboriously read by him who would fill up the gaps in the story of our English life. To omit this process is to be, in a great measure, at the mercy of mediæval chroniclers, who narrated that which seemed strange to them and passed over that which was familiar, and which is, for the practical purposes of our own time, best worth knowing. Records of inestimable value have, indeed, been published in more than one collection, in which learning and industry are seen to be combined with discrimination. But the earlier selections were made when the true functions of history were little understood; and though those of later date display great judgment in the attempt to supply what was previously omitted, they are necessarily imperfect, because mere extracts cannot be otherwise. To depend solely upon such compilations, even when most excellent, is to adopt, unwittingly perhaps, the historical views of the compilers, whose professed object was not to suggest new subjects for history, but to illustrate history in the sense in which it had previously been understood. Thus, as the hill country often remains unsubdued when the plains yield to a conqueror, so the province which we are now about to enter has been without an owner in literature, because it has been excessively difficult of access. But, like the Alps, it abounds in rich pastures, and offers scenes not less picturesque than the deeds of great warriors, and the marriages and progresses of kings and queens.

There is another consideration which might well deter an author from undertaking so difficult a theme. He is almost certain to incur the imputation of presumption. It is impossible even to sketch the plan of such a work without collateral study of a very wide range, for crimes can never be exhibited in their true light without some knowledge of the surrounding social conditions. But in proportion as the design is comprehensive the chances of error increase, and the writer must sometimes appear in an unfavourable light to those who are better informed on some particular point upon which his scheme has compelled him to touch. Perhaps, however, some indulgence may be shown to one who freely admits that mistakes are inevitable, and who asks that what is at least honestly done may be leniently judged.

Of the customs which prevailed in Britain before it fell under the dominion of the Romans we have but little evidence, and that little of a not very trustworthy character. To those who believe that the earlier population was extirpated by the barbarous tribes which succeeded the Romans as masters of the soil, there will appear to be no cause for regret that the annals of an extinct race have perished—if, indeed, they ever existed. Nor, for the purposes of this history, need the loss be very deeply deplored by those who hold a contrary opinion. There is no doubt that the settlers who crossed the German Ocean, and gave the name of England to Southern Britain, brought with them certain customs which, with little modification, constituted for many centuries the criminal law of the country. Municipal institutions and the tenure of land may, perhaps, present more difficulties to the historian, but it seems impossible that the rules for detecting and punishing crime which the Normans found in England, and from which a portion of our modern law has painfully emerged, can have come to us from any but a Teutonic source.

Teutonic origin of our Criminal
Law.

There may, perhaps, after this admission, appear no need to look beyond the Low German invasion of our island for the history of its crime and of its civilisation. Least of all may any such need be thought to exist when the further admission is made that Race cannot, in modern times, be satisfactorily weighed as one of the determining causes of crime in this country. But as the subsequent history will hold equally good whether we are or are not mainly of Teu-

Advantage of looking beyond the Teutonic Invasion.

tonic blood, and as our descent is at least a controverted point, it may be excusable, if not absolutely essential, to relate a few events and to describe a few customs which seem to repeat themselves in later times, and which, if they prove no more, prove how easily similar passions may be stirred by similar circumstances.

It is, indeed, unnecessary to make any excuse for introducing a comparison of Roman culture with the barbarism which preceded it and with the barbarism which afterwards almost annihilated it. If it be true that the same causes produce the same effects under the same conditions, there is a lesson to be learned from the rise and fall of Rome—the most impressive lesson, perhaps, which is taught anywhere in history. Rome did her best to civilise her empire when conquered, and it would be well if all conquering nations could boast that they had succeeded as well as she. But her first contact with all tribes was made known to them by the sharp edge of her sword, and recorded on their soil in the burial-mounds of their bravest sons. Could the whole world have been united under her tolerant sway, the whole world might have become like herself, and the progress of mankind would not have been retarded when the sceptre fell from her grasp. But with every new conquest she incurred a new danger; for what she first asserted was not her superiority in mind, but her superiority in brute force. Those who had been last brought under her yoke were always her most bitter enemies, because they had lost independence, and did not yet perceive how much they might gain in exchange. As her frontier was extended the circle of hostile barbarians grew larger, her own means of defence less available. The first art which she taught her new sub-

General view
of Roman Conquest and Roman Culture.

jects was the art of war, and they, in turn, taught it to their comrades beyond the border. Could their education have been completed, Rome might never have fallen, Christianity might long ago have been, in one form or other, the religion of every quarter of the globe, the inventions of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries might have been anticipated in the seventh or eighth, and the nineteenth century itself might have been a happier time for mankind than mankind can even hope to enjoy in the thirtieth. It was because she had risen by her legions that her legions caused her, as she deserved, to fall. It was because she was a generous mistress that she became, as she deserved to become, immortal. To those whose chief thoughts were of blood and iron, she appeared only as the fortunate, but hateful, possessor of troops with iron which was a little better tempered, and with blood which was a little less easily to be shed than their own. By those who had learnt from her how much she had to bestow, she was regarded with pride as a part of themselves. Thus did she illustrate the truism, often repeated, and nearly always forgotten, that the empire of the intellect is higher than the empire of the strong hand. Thus did she show, as she fell, what is not less worth remembering, that the acquisitions made in the course of human progress are always in jeopardy so long as there is any section of humanity cut off from the enjoyment of them. Men must advance in a body, or those who lag behind will drag back those who are pushing to the front. Never was this great principle more terribly illustrated, never was the true origin of crime more conspicuously brought to view, than when Roman Britain became the prey of Teutonic hordes.

When we enquire what was the condition of those Britons whom the Romans conquered we find no sources of information except some scanty notices by Roman authors, and even those notices are not always consistent one with the other. The absence of native records, however, goes far to show that the civilisation introduced from Rome was a great advance upon any which had previously been developed in Britain ; and there cannot be a doubt that Britain gained great benefits when she became a portion of the Roman Empire. It would be useless to discuss the manners and customs of the ancient Britons, except in those points which have a direct connection with the subject of the present history. But eighteen centuries ago the civilised world believed that there was in the far West of Europe a priesthood which exacted the penalty of death by burning, and as the exaction of the same penalty was sanctioned by another priesthood in another age, the belief is worthy of mention though it may not be unhesitatingly accepted as truth.

Of one mode of punishment inflicted by the priests of ancient Gaul and Britain there is an account, which was current in Rome, but which may be true or false, like other travellers' tales. It was held, we are told, in those countries, as elsewhere, that the sacrifice of human beings was pleasant to the powers which ruled the universe, that the life of one human being could be given as the ransom for the life and welfare of another, and that the wrath of the gods could always be appeased, if not by one life, by many. This belief was shared by other tribes in every part of the ancient world ; but by them it was supposed that the most acceptable offering was a life only just matured and as yet unsullied by crime. In Gaul and

It is uncertain what was the condition of Britain before the Roman invasion.

Alleged punishments and human sacrifices before the Roman occupation.

Britain, if we may believe the story which has been handed down to us, it was in the death of the criminal that the gods were thought to take the greatest delight. Elsewhere, in primitive times, it became a common custom to regard virginity as a type of sanctity and purity, and to sacrifice virgins to offended gods. In Gaul and Britain it was taught that the gods were made angry by crime, and relented only when the criminal had expiated his offence. There Iphigenia could never have raised that piteous wail, in which she bemoans her young life cut short for no fault of her own, the loss of all that woman holds most dear, the doom that denied her a husband and children. Had the gods demanded the sacrifice of only one human being, and had there been only one criminal, that criminal would have been selected, and the innocent maiden would have been spared.

The Gallic and British method of sacrificing criminals as described by the Roman author, is remarkable not only as an evidence of the sternness with which crime was said to be repressed by a priesthood, but also from the resemblance which it bears to the punishment inflicted on traitresses in England as late as the eighteenth century. The offenders were thrown into cages of wicker-work, made in the form of some well-known idol, and large enough to hold many human beings at once. Wood was heaped beneath and around them, and when all was ready the pile was kindled. The flames played about the fragile prison, and shot their forked tongues ever further and further into the mass of the writhing and shrieking victims. The semblance of the god was soon lost to view, but not before the crowd around had, as it seemed, seen the god himself deal death to the wrong-doers in its most appalling form. Then came one great blaze of the pile and the cage and the wretches who had been within it; and when that died out justice was satisfied, and the gods were content for a time. Had such scenes never been enacted in Smithfield, had women not been burnt in England a century and a half ago, the story of the Roman might be more easily disbelieved. Unhappily the similar horrors of a later time rest on evidence which is beyond all dispute.

If the Gauls and Britons were guilty of inflicting death by torture, the Romans appear at first sight to gain, in that respect, little by comparison. They not only burned Christians and slaves before Christianity was accepted in high places, but they made the exhibition of criminals battling with wild beasts in the arena one of the most prominent institutions of the Empire. To them, and to the inhabitants of their provinces, the death-pangs of the condemned, or, when none were condemned, of professional gladiators, became as familiar as the bull-fight is to the Spaniard, or as horse-races are to ourselves. While the baths were to the men what the clubs are to men of the nineteenth century, the amphitheatre was the public meeting-place for both sexes—the park, the opera-house, and the race-course in one. Beauties would bet sportively upon the issue of the struggle—eager for the death which would prove their judgment in the right. Sometimes the combat would be merely one of gladiator against gladiator; and so familiar was the Roman public with blood that there was an established signal—a mere motion of the thumb—by which the popular opinion bade the victor put the vanquished to death. A blow, perhaps a groan, a fresh layer of sand, a murmur of voices, such as we hear between the acts of a comedy, were the only indications that a life had passed away.

Roman punishments in the Arena.

When so small a value was set upon human blood within the arena, it may seem hardly possible that homicide without could be regarded as one of the greatest crimes. Yet the suspicion is not fully justified by other facts, nor by Roman laws. Value set upon human life by the Romans.

There have been handed down no statistics of the amount of crime committed throughout the Roman Empire, still less of its proportion to the population. The satirists, as many other satirists have done, mourn bitterly over the corruptions of the imperial city, over its murders, and its robberies, over the deceptions practised on the unwary, and the infidelities of married life. But there is little to be gathered from these vague declamations, except the fact that murder was regarded by certain ancient writers in Rome with almost as much horror as by ourselves in England at the present time.

The worst that can be said of the Roman criminal law, as it existed while Britain was Roman, is that it sanctioned torture for the purpose of extracting information, and the punishments of fire and of the arena for those offences which it pronounced most heinous, and that, in common with some barbarous laws, by which it was superseded, it magnified the offence in proportion to the littleness of the offenders. That which was almost venial in a man of high rank was a crime which brought terrible retribution upon a slave. Such distinctions are no more than an indication that authority has been won at the point of the sword, and that the conqueror belongs to a caste different from that of the conquered. But in this respect Rome may well bear comparison with the conquering nations which had preceded her and with many of those which followed her. She accepted that slavery which she found as an existing institution wherever she went, and with which she had grown familiar before she had conquered a province. But no nation could say of her that she had introduced slavery where it was unknown before. She conferred privileges, often amounting to equality, upon her subjects, and did not take away from them the privilege of keeping or of selling the slaves by whom they had always been served. In those points in which she placed the higher provincials on the level of slaves she placed the most favoured Roman on precisely the same level. In accusations of that crime alone which we should now call High Treason, she insisted that all men were equal in the eye of the law—to suffer the same torture—to die the same death.

The dark side of the Roman Criminal Law.

Turn wherever we may in the immortal codes which Rome has bequeathed to us we find everywhere the same liberality, restrained only, but everywhere restrained, by the same military tradition, the same determination to acquire, and to hold what has been acquired, if necessary, by the strong hand. By fire and sword she won her way, and she did not survive long enough to banish the recollection of sword and fire from her laws. The slave who accused his owner of any crime, except treason, was, for the mere offence of committing such an act of insubordination, punished ‘by the sword,’ or, in other words, was condemned to a gladiatorial combat in the arena. The slave who, without his owner’s knowledge, harboured a thief, the slave who committed adultery with a free woman, the coiner who brought discredit upon the currency of the Empire were, without mercy, given over to the flames.

What barbarism, it may be asked, could have been afterwards introduced more barbarous than such punish-

The origin of the more cruel punishments.

ments as these ? To that question a fitter answer may be given in subsequent details than by a general statement. But any one who should regard only these blots upon the Roman code would have not the slightest conception of its general scope. Nothing is more remarkable in it, nothing more deserving of admiration, than the evident design to find a penalty in just proportion to the offence, and to mark out distinctly the various grades of crime. The old Roman of the Republic could not imagine any sin more revolting than to murder a blood relation—father, mother, brother, sister, son, or daughter ; and the ancient tradition survived through all the luxury of the empire. Parricide was the legal name of this offence, and the different forms taken by the love of kindred among the Romans and among those who succeeded them in Britain are well worthy of remark. Among the Teutonic invaders of Britain, though the kin-tie was at the very root of their institutions, we shall find the loss of a kinsman regarded as an excellent opportunity for making a bargain ; among the Romans the family-bond was considered so sacred that a most extraordinary death was devised for him who violated it. Not in the amphitheatre, not at the stake, not on the cross was the parricide to perish. A sack was to be his winding-sheet ; in that he was to be sewn up alive, and venomous serpents with him. He was to be thrown into the sea if the sea was near at hand, and, if not, into a river, so that the heavens might be hidden from him while still alive, and the earth deny him a grave when dead.

Brighter side of the Roman Criminal
Law : gradation of punishments.

A number of crimes were by special laws declared capital — such as forcible entry upon land or house, adultery committed by a free woman with a slave, and infanticide. It should however be remembered that according to the Roman law a capital offence was not necessarily punished by death, but was also a technical description of those offences which were punishable by loss of civil condition—by degradation from freedom to slavery, or deprivation of the full privileges of citizenship. A punishment analogous to the French galleys, or imprisonment in our own dockyards, was the compulsory service in mines; transportation, too, was by no means uncommon; and the precursor of our own tread-mill may be found in the Roman hand-mill.

If the use of torture, the punishments inflicted on slaves, and the punishments for witchcraft and parricide, are left out of consideration, the Roman Criminal Law, as it existed during the later occupation of Britain, is remarkable, even to modern eyes, for the mercy which tempered its justice. Our knowledge of it is derived from the ordinances which the Emperors directed to various officers, and especially to persons exercising authority in the Provinces. We may, therefore, reasonably infer that, where the Roman power was fully established, the Roman law became, in all the more important criminal offences, the law by which the provincials were judged. In the towns which had an organisation of their own, some minor local customs may, in accordance with the liberal spirit of the Romans towards their subjects, have been permitted to survive, or even to grow up anew. But in cases of treason or homicide, the imperial jurisdiction was asserted, and the tenderness with which it was enforced is a remarkable contrast to the judicial murders of a later age. The witnesses, if of low rank, might, it is true, be tortured (as suspected persons might have been, many centuries afterwards, by license of the King of England, and later still by virtue of an Order in Council), but in other respects the accused had every protection which human forethought could devise against an unjust judgment. Sentence of death was not to be pronounced unless either the accused confessed, or all the witnesses agreed; the testimony of one witness alone, no matter what his rank, was insufficient; and all evidence had to be given on oath. When the witnesses were not unanimous, the matter might be referred to the Emperor if the accused had sufficient confidence in his own case.

Justice tempered with mercy under the Empire.

It is strange to find in the laws of a people which had always been familiar with slavery a regard for personal liberty such as was not to be discovered in English laws before the Habeas Corpus Act was ^{Regard for personal liberty.} passed in the reign of Charles II. No one was in the eye of the law so much as accused until the accusation had been made, according to legal form, in writing; still less could anyone be put to the torture upon the mere word of an enemy. Even when in gaol the accused were not to be subjected to any duress, nor were women to be imprisoned in the same room with men. The case of every prisoner was to be heard within a month, and, should either accused or accuser ask for a postponement, the judges were to make it as short as possible, and in no case allow it to exceed a year from the day of accusation. If the accuser did not appear to prosecute, or withdraw the charge within that time, he subjected himself to severe penalties, and the accused was of course set free. It was, too, a rule worthy of remark, and perhaps of imitation, that the evidence of an approver should be entirely rejected. No man's freedom or reputation could be endangered by the malice of one who confessed himself a criminal.

Should it be asked whether the inhabitants of the provinces had the full advantage of these beneficent laws, an answer may be found in a letter of the Emperor Constantine directed to 'The Provincials in General.' 'If there be any one,' he wrote, 'no matter what his dwelling-place or what his rank, who can prove any mis-deed against judge, or count, or friend of mine, or officer of my palace, let him lay the matter before me; I will hold him harmless, I will see right done, I will take care that he shall not suffer in standing or in substance.' Constantine also denied to senators the privilege of trial in their own country, and required that they should be brought to justice in the province in which they had committed a rape, or a forcible entry upon another man's land, or any other serious crime. The extortion of money by a provincial judge for his own use was afterwards declared a capital offence.

There is no doubt that when condign punishments are newly provided for any crime, the crime itself has been recently brought into notice. There is no doubt that when government is, in any sense, government by the sword, the governed are to some extent oppressed and plundered. Every classical scholar knows what Sicily suffered under Verres, and will be inclined to believe that Britain was not happier under any other Roman officer. Yet if we admit that there were unjust and rapacious governors sent from Rome, that military service was a grievous burden, and that the strict letter of the law was turned as much as possible against the native, rather than in his favour, we shall still be forced to the conclusion that life was in every way more tolerable in Britain for every class in the fourth century than it was in the fourteenth.

It is not in one rescript, nor in two, but in the whole spirit of the Roman law after the accession of Constantine that we perceive what generous sentiments were beginning to prevail, and how rapid might have been the advance of the civilised, could the barbarians only have been kept out. It was most humanely provided that when any man was convicted of any offence except treason, the punishment should not extend beyond himself, and that his children should enjoy his goods without deduction. A comparison may with profit be drawn between this law and the law, upon which Englishmen acted within the memory of living persons, that not only conviction of felony involved forfeiture of everything, but the mere flight of the accused involved the loss of all his goods and chattels.

*Compassion shewn under the Empire to the children
of criminals.*

Even in the case of slaves, too, though the punishment of burning was not extinct, there was welling up a new stream of thought which must soon have extinguished it, had not the barbarians overwhelmed the Empire. The fourth century, it must be remembered, was a time when Christianity was still young, when it had but just been adopted as the imperial religion in Rome, and when its priests could not act in direct opposition to the spirit of its Founder. There had been great moralists whom Greek Sophists had mocked, and whom Roman Epicureans had imitated, but none of them had enunciated the great principle—‘It is not the will of your Father in Heaven that one of these little ones should perish.’ In that sentence lies the great distinction between Heathen and Christian codes of morals; and though Christians might easily enough dis-

*Improvement
in the condition of slaves
after the adoption of Christianity.*

regard it when they had no longer to contend with opposing forms of faith, they were compelled, whether they would or not, to make much of it when the splendid worship of Jupiter, and the enlightened teachings of Aristotle were still competing for the approbation of mankind. Accordingly the first Christian Emperor forbade the practice of branding on the forehead those convicts who were condemned to the Games or to the Mines—punishments which involved the loss of freedom. It is true that the brand was to be placed on the hands or on the legs, just as it is true that slavery was not abolished. But the prohibition is none the less an indication that new views were beginning to show themselves in practice, and similar indications are by no means rare.

Constantine carefully limited the 'correction of slaves.' They might still be chastised with a slender rod or with the lash, but not, as in former times, with the cudgel. Among the prohibited punishments, too, were a mortal wound with any sharp weapon, the administration of poison, various kinds of torture, stoning, hanging, mutilation, and throwing from a height—'for these,' the Emperor added, 'are the cruelties of the ruthless barbarians.' Happy the provinces in the days of the Empire! The time was not far distant when those who had previously been free were to be made slaves, and all who had not the good fortune to be barbarians in Britain were to suffer those very atrocities which had excited the horror of Constantine—the mutilation, the fall down a precipice, and the stoning.

If we enquire what were, during the Empire, the ranks of men above the condition of slaves, we find in some respects a striking resemblance to the later feudal organisation, in others a striking difference. There was

Treatment of slaves by Romans and by barbarians.

a class which tilled the soil, and which was in a position very like that of the villeins regardant under the Plantagenet kings. When the land on which they were born was sold, they were handed over to the new owners by the same conveyance as the land itself; but like the villeins regardant, they could not be treated as mere chattels, and exported at the will of the landlord. Like the villeins, too, they acquired, or began with, privileges very nearly approaching those of the copyholder of later times. They paid a customary rent for the ground on which they lived, they could enjoy some at least of the profits of their own labours, and they could bequeath their property by will. Directly or indirectly they contributed not a little to the revenues of the Empire.

Social grades under the Empire: the tillers of the soil.

Above these subject farmers, and in close relation with them was a class which corresponded in many respects with the knight, or land-holder, of the later feudal period. These 'possessors' as they were called, were practically, however, the absolute owners of land, and could alienate it as they pleased, without the feudal restraints. They could even grant a species of lease in perpetuity, reserving to themselves a rent to be paid at stated seasons. In earlier times they were, like the feudal nobles, a military caste—men who had received a grant of land for good service, or who had inherited land through the good service rendered by their forefathers. But city plebeians, who were described as of splendid fortune, were by no means unknown in the provinces; and the trader whose great grandfather had, perhaps, been a manumitted slave, could, under the Empire, meet patrician land-owners on terms not altogether unequal.

The land-owners.

The possessors were subject to certain burdens, from which, indeed, land has rarely been altogether free. To repair the roads and the defences of the Empire, Duties of the landowners : the colonial courts. was a duty from which no men of substance were exempt; and from the land-owner was exacted that kind of service which in later times was known as 'suit of court.' In the provinces there were courts which met in the principal cities to transact financial business, and to appoint certain magistrates. The members had each to render an account for a particular district, usually, no doubt, the territory which belonged to him. The accounts rendered by the whole of the members of all these local courts furnished the sum total of the land tax collected throughout the Empire. A brief, but precious document, tells us that this organisation existed in Britain as it existed elsewhere, and that the government of Roman Britain was, in all material points, like the government of the other provinces.

The members of these colonial courts, though they had certain onerous duties to perform, enjoyed, in compensation, both social distinction and valuable Recognition of personal property : growth of commerce. privileges. Though themselves compelled to serve, they had the power of compelling others to serve with them, and of deciding, in accordance with imperial rescripts, who were duly qualified, and therefore bound to sit in their court. They could not, like their slaves and dependents, be put to the torture, nor subjected to any humiliating punishment, and their position in their own district was equal to that of the senators at Rome. Nor were they in the fourth century all men of the same class—all favoured Italians, or successful military adventurers—meeting to compare notes concerning the money which might be extorted from a subject population.

Anyone, no matter what his origin, who possessed the property qualification, was nominated a member of the court which administered the affairs of his district. As wealth increased, too, the importance of personal property began to be recognised, and considered to be a sufficient qualification for a seat in the court. Other taxes began to approach the land-tax in value, and commerce began to improve the aspect of the whole Roman world.

In the towns there were bodies known as colleges, or, as we should now say, companies or guilds, which were under the supervision of the imperial government, and which had evidently attained a high position before the Romans quitted Britain. Known in the earliest days of Roman history, they survived all changes of political constitution, and seem even to have acquired a political power of their own. The imperial laws contain numerous provisions for determining the relation of the guilds to those local courts which have already been described. It became a common practice to plead membership of a guild as a ground of exemption from membership of the court. The validity of this plea was not admitted, and the guilds-men, if duly qualified, were compelled to serve in the court, and, perhaps, even to abandon their guild. But there can be no better proof of the progress made by corporations of various kinds than the fact that their members had the qualification for a seat in an essentially aristocratic court, and were yet by no means ambitious to occupy it.

As in the case of the local courts, so in the case of the Roman guilds, there is sufficient evidence to show that what happened in other provinces happened also in Britain. In various places inscriptions have been found which prove the existence in Britain of those guilds which are mentioned in the

Britain enjoyed the full benefit of Roman civilisation.

Theodosian Code, some of which were commercial and others religious. Nor, indeed, can there be any reasonable doubt that the Roman civilisation flourished at one time in all its splendour, not, perhaps, in the remote West, but from the Western Hills to the German Ocean, and from Hadrian's Wall to the Channel.

The loss to Britain, when she was deprived of all that the Romans had given her, is told not only in those laws

Her loss
when the Romans abandoned her.

towards which we have approached more nearly as we have risen above the succeeding lawlessness, and which we know to have been established in our island, but in other monuments which not even ages of barbarism could wholly destroy. The ploughman still lights sometimes upon a store of coins which bear the image and superscription of men who ruled the civilised world. Busts which still bear traces of the sculptor's skill, pottery which still bears the mark of the factory where it was made, fragments of pillars and of mosaic pavements, the remains of roads built with such forethought and care as to command the admiration of modern road-makers, attest the combination of a great organisation with a knowledge which almost deserves to be called scientific. These silent witnesses rise year after year from the grave, to assure us that the 'Itinerary' of Antonine is no fiction—that there were no less than fifteen great roads in Roman Britain, each studded with growing towns, or with cities already magnificent. The peaceful arts leave behind them memorials more lasting than all the works of Agamemnon, or of the brave men who may have lived before him. They need not, like him, the inspired poet to sing their praises, but speak to posterity even after savages have destroyed them. It is not less easy to restore the design of a ruined temple, or to sketch the outline of a mutilated statue, than to represent to human eyes the form of beasts which lived before there were human beings upon earth. Those chapters in codes of Roman law which treat of public works, and prove how important they were in the mind of a Roman, need no commentary but the relics which accident or research has already brought to light in Britain. The pride with which each city was taught to regard its own works of art was, indeed, brought low, but is still to be read in the piteous lines of sculpture disfigured and buried for centuries, no less than in the law that the ornaments of one city should not be transferred to another. All that Rome had borrowed from Greece she lent in turn to the provinces which acknowledged her sway; and we know, with as much certainty as we know any fact in history, that Southern Britain could boast of towns rich in public buildings, to which a long period of quiet and order had given all the grandeur of classical art. And this was fifteen hundred years ago.

Fifteen hundred years ago Southern Britain was a land in which the most luxurious English gentleman of modern times, could he abolish the intervening A journey in Roman Britain. centuries, would find life more to his taste than in that England which his great-grandfather thought marvellously civilised. When he rose in the morning some favourite slave would bring him his letters, one of which might, perhaps, be an invitation to stay with the Governor at a country villa. He would travel just as our grandfathers travelled, in a carriage, but by a better and a straighter road, and he would find relays of horses (provided only for men of rank) at convenient stages. If his journey was long, he would pass through at least one town in which the architecture of the court-house, and of many temples, could hardly fail to command his admiration. Perhaps, too, he might recognise a friend among the officers of a legion in garrison, with whom he might exchange a word or two while the horses were being changed, or he might inspect a mint in full operation. Further on he might meet another legion on the march—a legion of British soldiers destined for foreign service, or a legion from beyond sea brought over to do duty in Britain. Save these casual suggestions of the pomp and circumstance of war, he would encounter only indications of peace, of wealth, and of security. If he enquired what was yonder pile of buildings—a town in all but gates and towers of defence—he would learn that it was the villa perchance of some imperial officer, perchance of some Romanised Briton, descended from a line of petty kings, perchance of a merchant who had grown wealthy in trade. But, in a day's travel, he would see villa after villa, till the sight, like the sight of innumerable mile-stones, would cease to be a novelty, and he would cease to enquire for the owner.

At the moment when he began to be fatigued with a long day on the road, he might possibly be struck by the beauty and convenience of the site chosen for some villa more imposing than any he had passed. He would hear, perhaps, with agreeable surprise, that it was the country house or palace of Pacatian, 'Vicar of the Britains.' His carriage would be driven up a long and straight avenue, terminating in a flower garden in which box-trees and yew-trees were cut into innumerable fantastic shapes. The front of the house presented a long range of pillars, forming a continuous portico or covered walk, from which the grounds and the landscape could be seen to greatest advantage.

Splendour of a villa in Britain under the Empire.

Beyond the portico was a hall, in which the guest would be received, and which was unlike anything within the ordinary experience of modern Englishmen. It was a square room of vast dimensions, roofed in at the four sides, but open in the centre. It consisted of four galleries enclosing a basin, into which the rain fell in wet weather, and in which a fountain played when required. The floors of these galleries were tessellated pavements of no rude workmanship, and were, in fact, exquisite paintings in mosaic, surpassed only by the still more exquisite mosaic of the inner-basin. The walls were relieved by statues representing all the favourite subjects of the old mythology—Orpheus and his lyre, Naiads, Satyrs, and Centaurs, Pan, and Triton, all the subjects of classical romance, with, perhaps, a bust of the reigning emperor. From the great reception hall, unless his chamber communicated with it immediately, he would be conducted to another still greater hall, built in the same fashion, and adorned with the same splendour. A door in this peristyle, as it was called, opened into a small ante-room, or dressing-room, through which he would pass to his bed-room. If he asked for a bath, he could enjoy it in any form he pleased, but most readily that kind of bath which is now known as the Turkish. Wherever he went some work of art would meet his eye—paintings on the walls of his chamber, paintings and sculpture in the passages which led to the bath-rooms, paintings and sculpture in the bath-rooms themselves. Nothing which could gratify the senses, or even the intellect, was forgotten. The very pavements, which were worthy of study for their beauty and remarkable for their exquisite cleanliness, were warmed, if necessary, by an elaborate network of stoves and flues, watched by a troop of unseen slaves, in the basement beneath the principal apartments.

When the guest returned to his chamber, he would find himself protected from chill by a glazed window, not unlike the lattices which are even now to be seen in England. When summoned to dinner, he would enter the dining-room through the greater hall, in which the fountains would be playing, and in which flowers and shrubs tastefully arranged would suggest the idea that the host or his wife had a love of nature as well as of art. If he paused a moment, to look more carefully around him, he would perceive that the leading conception of the architect had been to surround all that was most exquisite in art with the beauties of nature. If he turned his eyes to the portico by which he had entered, he could still see the garden and avenue by which he had approached the house, with green woods and sparkling streams in the distance; if he turned his back to the entrance, he could see, beyond the Corinthian pillars and brilliant frescoes in the midst of which he stood, another and more carefully tended garden, and, in the background, a bright landscape of hill and dale, rich with a golden harvest, and enlivened by a throng of harvesters.

It is needless to dilate upon the luxury of such a dinner as a Roman governor would have given to an honoured guest. The subject has been often handled, and has not, like the prosperity of the arts and the building of innumerable unfortified palaces in the open country, a direct bearing upon the general feeling of security, nor, therefore, upon the History of Crime.

Yet it may not be out of place to recall in imagination such a conversation as may have passed, at some time during a long visit, between the governor or his wife and a guest who was regarded as an intimate friend. The wife would have shown herself to be, like the governor himself, a person of culture and of ^{Culture of its occupants.} taste. Like a modern English lady, she held a high position, and was not, like the women of a savage or half-civilised tribe, placed on the level of a slave, forced to do the work which was beneath the dignity of a man, married by the ceremony of sale to a master. Both she and her children were secured against future poverty, so far as human circumstances permit security, by such settlements as are made in the present day. She had the command of waiting women, who were slaves, and she was respected both by the whole household and by her husband. If it pleased her, she could devote her time and her wealth to those feminine adornments in which the ladies of ancient Rome may almost be said to have set the fashion to the ladies of modern Europe. She could buy jewels and silk to her heart's content, and pile up false hair on her head as high as she pleased. But she could also (and many a Roman lady did) cultivate her mind as well as decorate her person. She had been taught in childhood by the same tutor as her brothers, and had access, after marriage, to her husband's well stored library.

With a lady such as might have been Pacatian's wife, or with Pacatian himself, a relative or friend of long standing might have discussed the politics of the day, and the position of Britain in the ^{General sense of security in Roman Britain.} civilised world. It would have been hardly possible that such a question could have been asked as whether life and property were reasonably secure in the South Eastern, or truly Romanised part of the island.

Yet, had such a question been asked, it is not difficult to recall the easy and ready answer which would have been given. 'You have travelled the whole day in comfort, and have nowhere been robbed, or molested, or threatened. You have seen the natives peacefully gathering in their corn, which is more than sufficient for our wants, which can be easily carried from the very centre of the island to the sea, and some of which may be exported to less favoured lands. You have passed villa after villa standing alone in the open country, with no fortification, and with no protection save that which the owner's slaves would render without fail in case of need. You have met a legion of British soldiers, marching cheerfully to serve against the enemies of the Empire, of which they are proud to believe that they are not the subjects but the citizens. If you would know whether such human happiness as is possible anywhere is possible in Britain, you have but to trust the evidence offered to your senses every hour of the day.'

Though, however, the condition of his province might well have been a cause of pride to the governor, he might yet sometimes have seen, in imagination, a warning writing on the frescoed wall of his palace. 'No land,' he might have argued, 'is so secure as Southern Britain—protected from the barbarians of the island itself by a continuous line of fortresses—protected from the barbarians of Northern Germany by the stronger fortress of the sea. But, secure as Britain seems, even she is in danger, and, perhaps, not least in danger where her strength seems greatest. The greed of gold has made us what we are, but well does it deserve to be called, as the poet has called it, accursed, when citizens of Rome give Roman arms and teach Roman from without:

The dangers
the barbarism which was to come.

arts of war to barbarians for a flock of sheep or a drove of oxen. Avaricious shipwrights have passed our Bata-vian frontier, and taught the art of ship-building to a brutal race which lives in the Northern wilds beyond. Our empire is the empire of the sea no less than of the land; but these Germans, who have long lived by plunder on land, have already learned to seek plunder by sea. There will, no doubt, issue, ere long, an imperial edict forbidding Romans to do that which they have already done with too good effect. It will come, like many other edicts, too late.'

When the Empire was decaying, luxury was accompanied by a train of vices, very well known to savages, who enjoy a reputation for virtue only because they are unable to satirise their own misdeeds in writing. But the codes of Roman law are sufficient to prove that justice and mercy had kept pace with the advance of wealth and enlightenment. A Roman governor might have been, as might be even a modern Englishman, unjust and an extortioner, but he might also have been a man liberal alike in thought and in action, and delicately sensitive to the sufferings of others. In one of the better kind of Romans, the contemplation of such a possible event as the subjection of Britain to barbarous hordes from beyond the sea must have been intolerably painful. Yet, even a morbid imagination could hardly draw a picture more gloomy than the events of many succeeding centuries. The land which had been cleared was again to become waste and forest, the roads were to continue in existence not so much by rude attempts to repair them as through the skill with which they had been first constructed. The walls of the villas were to be demolished, sometimes out of mere wantonness, sometimes to build a hut for a contemptuous savage. Nothing was to remain of all the past splendour, save, perhaps, the towns which were impregnable to barbarians, some works too solid for barbarians to destroy, and some shattered tokens of the fine arts which, to barbarians, were meaningless. All this a Governor of Britain, who was familiar with the foreign affairs of his time, might have foreseen. He might have foreseen the day when the physicians, the secretaries, and the jesters of a future governor—nominally his slaves, in reality his friends—would be ruthlessly killed, or become the slaves of brigands who had never seen papyrus or parchment, and to whom writing was an unknown art. He must have had compassion for all who were to survive when military adventurers had sown dissension throughout the Empire, when Britain had, by intestine commotions, prepared her soil for an invader, and when the only invaders who could appear possessed hardly the rudiments of civilisation. ‘There are few of my slaves,’ he might have said, ‘who have not more culture than a barbarian king. There are none for whom the future can be even tolerable, except, perhaps, the ploughmen and the grooms. The barbarians enjoy sport after their rough fashion ; they cannot live without corn ; and they may spare at least the lives of the men, who can feed them and keep their horses in condition. Yet it were better to kill a horse, or even a dog, than suffer it to be tortured by those merciless pirates, who are learning to sail on the Northern Sea.’

Before, however, we pass from the rule of the Romans to the rule of their successors, it is necessary to glance at some other matters which have their bearing upon the history, even if we assume that not one human being of British or Roman stock has

Roman and other superstitions.

English descendants at the present day, and that no traditions survived the horrors of the Teutonic inroads. Superstition plays so prominent a part in the History of Crime, it asserts itself in so many different shapes—from the practice of the ordeal to accusations of witchcraft—that it is not altogether unworthy of study wherever it may be found. There are, therefore, two justifications for touching on the superstitions which must have had footing in Britain during the Roman occupation. One is that subsequent events may receive some illustration from the wide realm of superstition in general, the other that, in the eyes of those who disbelieve the story of extermination by Teutonic swords, the continuity of our history may not be lost.

Fortune-telling in various forms, incantations, love-potions, magic, and many other appeals to human credulity are frequently mentioned, half laughingly, half seriously, by Roman writers of all ages. The Roman equivalent for witchcraft was a capital offence by the laws of the Twelve Tables. Horace gives a description of Canidia that would serve well enough for a witch of the seventeenth century. It was supposed that she had dealings with the powers of darkness below, and that she had some influence over the stars. She could deprive the body of its vigour, the complexion of its beauty, the hair of its colour. She could command sickness and pain to be present whenever she pleased. She could mount on the shoulders of her enemies and ride them whither she would.

The witches of Rome, like the witches in Macbeth, joined in hideous rites at midnight. Like the witches afterwards condemned in English courts of law, they were said to have made images of the persons whose destiny was to be influenced, and to have done to the images that which they wished to befall the living beings. The whole of the witch's apparatus was in the one age precisely what it was in the other, even to the infernal familiars in the shape of dogs and other brutes.

Later writers attributed to various priesthoods, and among them to that of the Britons, extraordinary powers of magic. Before the great British revolt, under Boadicea, it is credibly related that the Roman veterans were depressed by the supernatural manifestations which, as they supposed, threatened them with destruction. The statue of Victory which had been set up in Camulodunum (the modern Colchester) fell to the ground without apparent cause, and turned its back in token of defeat. Women, with the inspiration of madness, sang of death and destruction. Strange noises were heard in the court-house, and loud howlings in the theatre. The likeness of the town itself in ruins was seen in the estuary of the Thames. The very sea appeared to be stained with blood, and the shore to be strewn with dead bodies when the tide ebbed. The credulous Roman soldiers heard these stories and trembled.

The imported scepticism of such writers as Horace, the growth of the towns, and, with it, the promise of a higher civilisation, were influences operating during the Roman occupation of Britain, which had, perhaps, some tendency to eradicate these superstitions. But we know from many passages in the Theodosian Code that, in civilised Rome herself, after Rome had become Christian, it was thought right to torture and burn wizards and magicians. And when we reflect that so great a man as Sir Matthew Hale expressed his belief in witchcraft, we may feel certain that superstition had not been rooted out of Britain in the fourth century. The polytheism of the Romans had, before Christianity was the religion of Rome, practically, though not theoretically, degenerated into a kind of pantheism. In their empire there was no natural object which might not have its own divinity or genius, no human being who might not aspire to be Emperor, and after dying as Emperor, to live again as God. In the efforts to subvert the ancient beliefs Christians recognised witchcraft as a worship of devils; and if they recognised it at Rome we may be sure that they recognised it in Britain. The stories that Peter the Apostle made a journey in person, and that St. Paul despatched Aristobulus to convert the Britons, are not found in any writings which will endure the test of historical criticism; nor is there any evidence that Joseph of Arimathæa ever set foot upon this island. It is, nevertheless, tolerably certain that some form of Christianity, already infected with Gnosticism and with the old superstitions of paganism, was well known in Britain, if not generally accepted, before the Romans abandoned the island. A few sentences will suffice to show what was the character of that faith in its relation to the purposes of the present history.

It is possible by a train of reasoning which would be out of place in the text, of this work, to show that Christianity was known in some portion of the British Islands, if not in that portion which is now called England, before the Council of Nice. This, however, it may be said, was not the Christianity of the Roman Church. So much the features of the subsequent controversies, in England, in the seventh century, upon the observance of Easter, and other matters, are sufficient to prove. In order, there-

Introduction of Christianity into Britain.

fore, to ascertain what was believed by the early British Christians it is necessary to consider what was believed by Christians in other parts of the world, as well as in Rome, before the fourth century. It happens that most of the writers who lived during that period were natives of the East—of Egypt, of Palestine, or of Asia Minor; and it is not a little remarkable that they give evidence of an almost universal belief in the same superstitions. The authors, as Christians, had an interest in the events and in the creeds of the whole Christian world, and they enable us to discover that many opinions passed current from Africa to the Alps, and from Asia Minor to the British Islands. They tell us, in fact, precisely what might have been inferred from passages in the Theodosian Code.

In almost all the countries of the Roman Empire the pagans believed that rocks, and woods, and springs, or the deities which presided over them, had the power of bestowing blessings or inflicting injuries. Wherever Christians dwelt among pagans they shared the same belief, but called the supposed powers by the name of ‘demons,’ and held everything connected with these evil spirits accursed. It is impossible to read the works of Tertullian, Origen, or Eusebius without perceiving that in their imagination the earth, and all that is upon or around it, must have been peopled with numberless invisible beings. Tertullian declared that Christians ought not to be present at those spectacles in which the Roman world delighted because they were ceremonies which had their origin in idolatry, because idolatry was equivalent to the worship of demons, and because all who had been baptised had promised to renounce the devil and his angels. Origen insists again and again upon the virtue existing in the names of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, which had only to be mentioned in order to put all demons to flight. He supposed that these enemies of mankind had taken up their abode in the dense air which hangs immediately above the earth, and that they were known by the names of Jupiter and of all the other heathen gods. He believed that they had light and volatile forms, which, like the wind, were unseen, but went where they listed, and that it was their malignant influence which produced famines, and blights, and droughts, and epidemics. The arts of magicians, and of all who practised sleight of hand, appeared to him to be the works of devils. But though the evil spirits had not the gross bodies of human beings, they could not, it was supposed, exist without food; they delighted especially in blood, which they eagerly licked up when sacrifices were offered to idols. Sometimes even the liberty of the demons themselves could be restrained by the devices of magic; and a devil could be chained to a grave or a building as surely as a horse could be held by his tether.

The superstitions with which it was infected.

These doctrines, which developed in the East into the most charming of all romances degenerated in the West into the most grovelling superstitions. The Teutonic adventurers perhaps learned Their wide diffusion. nothing from the people they vanquished. Ideas, which, from their wide diffusion over the Roman Empire, must have been independent alike of race and language, might well have been shared by barbarians outside the circle of Roman conquest. That which was common to the Egyptian fellah and the Italian colonist might well have been common also to the German robber. A few sentences in Tacitus, which would be equally applicable to the beliefs of any uncivilised tribe, or even to the religion of the Romans, are all that remain to tell us of the creeds which came from Germany to Britain. Centuries afterwards the curtain is lifted again and we see mingled with Christianity in England, but deprived of all their beauty, those strange fancies with which the writings of the Eastern fathers teem, which have given names to imaginary crimes, and, age after age, have been put forward as the excuse for inhuman atrocities.

In Christian England, when it first becomes known to us under that name, one of the most striking features is the popular belief in the power of human beings to make contracts with demons. Their appearance after the mission of Augustine. Special penances were provided for those who, by evil practices, acquired the art of sending forth tempests : in this and in similar cases it is always clear that the punishment is inflicted not for believing in the influence of the demons, but for making use of that existing influence to attain an end. The demons themselves seem commonly to be identified with the old pagan gods, who were held in honour many generations after Augustine's mission. Even as late as the beginning of the eleventh century it was thought necessary to enact that Christianity should be maintained and Heathenism expelled. The clergy during the whole of this time seem to have been most firm believers in the power of those who styled themselves magicians or enchanters ; and it was even decreed that if one of the clergy himself practised the forbidden arts he should be degraded. Witchcraft, as practised by women, already comes into prominence. A penance of one year's duration was considered sufficient for ordinary offences of this kind ; but when the woman succeeded, by her devilish devices, in killing her victim, the amount of her punishment was multiplied by seven. The crime of seeking out a person who professed to foretell the future, or of inviting such person to enter a house, was not less heinous than sorcery itself. If a clergyman, the transgressor incurred the sentence of degradation ; if a layman, he subjected himself to a five years' penance. It was a common practice to make vows at particular spots which were supposed to be favoured by supernatural powers, at trees, at springs, and at stones, just as in the days of Origen and Eusebius. Love and hatred, fertility and sterility, success and failure, health and disease, even existence itself were believed to be, partly at least, in the hands of the demons or pagan gods, who employed the enchanters as their agents.

Almost indistinguishable from the belief in witchcraft, as will be seen in later history, was the belief that persons subject to epilepsy, mania, or any form of mental weakness were possessed by a devil, which could be expelled by the performance of certain religious ceremonies. The Church sanctioned a form of exorcism, and the exorcist was considered to hold the third rank in the ecclesiastical order. In England an attempt was made to combine the forces of medicine with the forces of religion, just as, many centuries afterwards, it was the custom to consult a physician upon the cases of persons bewitched. Prescriptions were accordingly given, even in these early days not indeed for the cure of madness, but for the ejection of devils. The remedies were usually in the form of drinks. Ale was always one of the ingredients, mixed with various herbs. Sometimes twelve masses were sung over the mixture before it was administered ; sometimes holy water was poured into the ale. One recipe, however, was considered efficacious against the devil without any assistance from the Church; it was an emetic, which, we may presume, was supposed to dislodge him bodily from his seat in the patient's frame.

In order to understand the prominence assumed by accusations of witchcraft in later times it is necessary to remember that the belief in the practice has descended from the most remote ages, has received in turn the stamp of many religions, and was unfortunately, though perhaps, inevitably, sanctioned by the successors of Augustine. The educated monks, who were the literary and scientific men of their day, have handed down in writing a number of charms which throw considerable light on the subject. To find cattle, to recover stolen goods, to heal the sick, to guard against 'every strange thing that cometh by air or by land,' were objects which, according to the ideas then prevalent, could be attained by certain collocations of words, and without incurring the sin of sorcery. Our forefathers, when they were converted, learned not to abandon their faith in charms, but to seek new charms in the 'Pater Noster' and the 'Credo.' They were not brought face to face with a pure Christianity. At that time, when the Church discovered a stronghold of pagan superstitions, it fought not always for the demolition of the fortress, but for possession in its own name. Gregory himself suggested to Augustine that the buildings in which the ancient gods had been worshipped should not be destroyed but converted to the service of Christianity. The same principles pervaded every field of human life. The leech-books are not only full of pagan and of Christian devices for obtaining supernatural assistance, but show us the new creed marching boldly upon the

The crime of witchcraft
and the Church.

ground of the diviner and the magician, and endeavouring to swallow them up as Aaron's rod had swallowed up the rods of the Egyptians. And thus, if the enchanters of the past had pointed out where that which was lost could be found by their arts, the Church was prepared with enchantments which were no less powerful, but which did not derive their power from the Devil. If the peasant discovered that his land was bewitched, he was assured that the priest could aid him as effectually and more safely than the sorcerer.

Thus far, only those beliefs and customs have been noticed which were, or, for all we know to the contrary, might have been, common to all the earliest inhabitants of the British Islands, or which may serve hereafter as a measure of civilisation, or as materials for an instructive contrast. It now becomes necessary to follow the Teutonic settlers from their home on the continent, and to discover whether they brought with them any laws and customs which have a bearing upon the History of Crime.

The German tribes in general, according to Roman accounts, regarded homicide as a crime of little moment, hardly, indeed, as a crime at all. Bloodshed, and acquisition through bloodshed, are described as being the profession of the German; and the slaughter of a member of his own tribe was considered a less reprehensible action than a petty theft. The offence was easily expiated by the forfeit of a small portion of his wealth; and he had no wealth but horses, cattle, and sheep. A part of the fine was paid to the relatives of the deceased, who were supposed to be aggrieved by the loss of their kinsman and to receive an equivalent in a sufficient quantity of live stock. The remainder was paid to the chief, or became the common property of the tribe.

Customs introduced by the Teutonic settlers.

Setting a price upon human life: the blood-feud.

In this practice are to be found, on the one hand, the rudiments of our early laws relating to homicide, and, on the other hand, a point of contact with the usages of the savage in every part of the world. During the Homeric age the blood-feud was as fully recognised in Greece as afterwards in Germany; and one of the most prominent scenes on the marvellous shield designed by Hephæstus is a dispute concerning the payment of the fine. The institution prevailed in Ireland and Wales after the Teutonic conquest of Southern Britain, and probably even during the Roman occupation of this island. The progress of philological discovery suggests plausibly enough that this with other customs might have been introduced by the people which planted the Aryan group of languages over nearly the whole of Europe, and a great portion of Asia. Such a view, however, seems to be somewhat too narrow to embrace the whole of the facts. There is much to be learned from the study of philology, but still more from the study of human nature. Payment for human life is by no means simply co-extensive in its range with the diffusion of any group of languages. The ties of family have been recognised in this or a similar form in every nation or tribe of which the earliest history has been transmitted to us. The 'Avenger of Blood' appears in the laws of the Jews precisely as the obligation of the family to adopt the quarrel of the individual is found among the Germans described by Tacitus, and precisely as the next of kin prosecutes the murderer in England, both before and after the Norman Conquest. There are differences with respect to the estimation in which the offence is held, and the severity with which it is punished ; but from the care with which compounding is prohibited in the Jewish law there is good reason to believe that it was not unknown either among the Jews themselves or among the nations which surrounded them. In short, the ties of blood are so obvious that they have never escaped the notice of the wildest savage in either hemisphere, and the cupidity which will take goods in place of revenge is not the heritage of one tribe more than of another.

Wide diffusion of the custom.

The existence, however, of the blood-feud, combined with the principle of compensation, where it has become an established custom, indicates a particular stage of human progress. It shows that a chieftain or governing body has perceived the advantage to the community of preserving as many lives as possible for the common good. The primitive warrior's doctrine is that there is nothing to be gained by diminishing the available force of his battle-array, by inflicting death for an offence which shows no lack of courage. Better, he thinks, to reserve ignominy and the last extreme of punishment for those who will not or cannot fight. Such was the doctrine of the ancient Germans, such the doctrine of every tribe no further advanced in civilisation. It is one step, and only one step, in advance of the most savage form of life, in which compensation is impossible because there is no property even in flocks and herds, in which the whole world is supposed to be a hunting-ground, and in which there is no right or justice but the will of the strongest. It is discovered only in a state of society in which mercy, generosity, and that quality which has been misnamed chivalry, have as yet found no place. It belongs only to those who will slay the wounded as they lie on the ground, and will, like Achilles, drag a fallen foe behind the victorious chariot.

Stage of human progress in which it exists.

Such a condition of society naturally endures a longer or a shorter time in accordance with the genius of par-

It was inseparable from Teutonic conquest. ticular tribes, or with their opportunities of improvement. It has been so well marked in the German-speaking nations, and it continued among them so long that it has often been described as one of their essential characteristics. The fact, however, that wherever a Teutonic tribe effected a settlement in a province of the Roman Empire it introduced the practice of compounding for homicide proves no more than that the whole of these tribes were in a state of extreme barbarism. Goths in Spain, Burgundians and Franks in Gaul, Lombards in Italy, and all those adventurers, whatever their true names may have been, who conquered a portion of Britain, showed themselves to be all on the same level of culture. They carried with them to their new homes those customs which—when writing had been taught them—they committed to writing, and dignified by the title of Dooms or Institutes. Sometimes they adopted either for themselves or for their subjects, a portion of the Roman Law which was drawn up for them in the form of a code; but in such documents as this they inserted a clause reciting, with a quaint air of wonder, and in a tone of some superiority, that the Romans had omitted to specify the tax upon murder. This flaw, as they supposed it to be, in the Roman system of justice, they invariably made good. With a superfluity of detail, and with an abundance of distinctions, they appraised the life of every human being in the land, from that of the king to that of the slave. From these crude beginnings it has been necessary to evolve the criminal law with respect to homicide in almost every country in Europe.

In that portion of Britain which was afterwards called England, there can be little doubt that the Roman Law had, in important matters, superseded all the native customs. And though even here the practice of compounding for homicide had probably been in existence before the Roman occupation, there is not the least reason to suppose that it was revived, in the more civilised portion of the island, before the coming of the Teutonic settlers. To them, and to them only, must be ascribed the re-introduction of barbarism in this form. As they were strong enough to impose their language, they must have been strong enough to impose their criminal rules upon those whom they did not slay. Wherever they were brought into contact with Roman civilisation, their course seems to have been uniform, and in this respect at least Britain could hardly have constituted an exception.

It was introduced anew into Britain by the Teutonic invaders.

The history of human thought with respect to homicide can thus be traced continuously from its starting-point in savage life, through the very earliest forms of civilisation, through the conflict of ideas which arose when trade and letters asserted their right to exist against private and public wars, and robbery, and ignorance, through all our political convulsions, down to the present age of security and refinement. There is but one point which seems open to controversy—the question whether town life, with the results which it has produced, has descended to us from the Romans, or has been independently developed by the Teutonic conquerors. It will be seen in a subsequent page, that the partisan of either theory may hold his own opinion without prejudice to the general course of the narrative. The power of the towns to effect any advance beyond the first two or three stages of improvement was for many centuries in abeyance. If they continued to exist throughout the horrors which followed the evacuation of Britain by the Romans, they were in the end compelled to accept terms from the victor, and to adopt his usages with respect to crime.

When England first emerges into the light of history, about the end of the seventh century, the descendants of the pagan invaders and their subjects were nominally Christians. The process of conversion has been narrated by Bede, and his story is, to a certain extent, confirmed by the letters of some of the Popes ; but he lived so long after the events which he pretends to describe, and he has in other matters relied upon such worthless authorities, that it would be unsafe to give his statements implicit belief. The fact, however, that the inhabitants of Britain professed Christianity in his time may be considered undeniable ; it remains only to enquire what had been the effects of Christianity upon crimes and their expiation.

Except in one point, which will be considered in its relation to the influence of towns, there was, neither in the eighth century nor at any subsequent time before the Norman Conquest, any modification of the ancient Teutonic view with respect to murder. During this period the governing powers seem to have done more towards barbarising Christianity than Christianity towards softening the manners of its proselytes. The prelates were associated with the other ' wise men ' in framing rudimentary codes for the petty states, and finally for the whole of England ; but they appear to have adapted themselves to the society in which they lived. They

It survived
the re-establishment of Christianity.

added the weight of their authority to various compilations of laws, but, except where the Church itself seemed in danger, they succeeded in doing but little towards infusing a Christian spirit into the laws themselves. They not only sanctioned the principle of compounding for murder, but established, side by side with it, the principle of compounding for penances.

The history of the latter custom shows how strangely opposite causes may lead to similar results. The doctrine of penance clearly arose out of the moral doctrine that he who does wrong to his neighbour should not only make compensation, but should himself undergo a proportionate amount of suffering.

It was associated with the practice of compounding for penances.

To mortify the flesh was very early considered meritorious by Christians, so far as any human action or conduct could possess any merit; and it was therefore natural enough to believe that each particular sinful deed required a particular act of mortification. Hence arose the practice of assigning fasts of greater or less duration for various offences, including those of which the secular law took cognisance. But the sick and the strong could not sustain the pains of abstinence with equal powers of endurance; and the penalty which was nominally the same was seen to be very different in fact when applied to different individuals. It therefore became necessary to vary the form of punishment in order that the weak and the aged might not suffer beyond their strength. The substitutes for fasting were prostrations and genuflexions, the singing of psalms, repetitions of the 'Pater Noster,' 'Credo,' or other prayers, and alms-giving. As soon, however, as the principle of substitution was admitted it led on to a system of equivalents. A certain number of psalms or prayers was declared equal to a certain length of fast. If the language of modern finance may be applied to such a subject, the fast was the metal which, as the Mint adopts gold in the present day, was adopted by the Church for its standard ; the psalms, the prayers, and the alms were, like our notes, and silver, and copper, the tokens which were allowed to pass current for the sake of convenience. Though, perhaps, the transition was inevitable, when the difficulties in the imposition of penances had been recognised, this principle of commutation at once effected a complete change in the character of penance itself as an institution. To give alms as an atonement for a crime, though the name might disguise the true nature of the transaction, was in reality to escape by a sacrifice of worldly goods the personal suffering which had been regarded not only as an element of justice, but as a salutary moral discipline, for the wrong-doer. From first to last, perhaps, an attempt was made to inflict a real punishment—to adjust the payment to the means of the offender, and not simply, as in the case of the psalms and the prayers, to the length of the fast which had been enjoined. At first, too, the privilege of compounding might have been rigidly restricted to those for whom it was originally intended. But the seeds of corruption were sown, and when ambition found its way into the Church, alms were readily enough accepted from rich penitents, whether they were in sickness or in health.

One of the first effects of the introduction from Rome of confession and penance, together with the principle of commutation, was to strengthen those distinctions of class which were already only too familiar to the German-speaking conquerors. Those who had alms to give enjoyed a favour which was necessarily denied to those who were destitute, whose

Distinctions of class in the criminal
laws.

bodies, and whose very souls were not their own. If ever it was distinctly manifest that there was one law for the rich and another for the poor in England, it was in the four centuries which immediately preceded the Norman Conquest. In those days men truly gave to him that had, and from him that had not they took away even that which he seemed to have. The noble could murder, and be quit for a fine to the Church and another to be divided between the kinsfolk of the slain and the king. He had the satisfaction of reflecting that, if murdered himself, his rank would be remembered in the sum to be paid as his price. The slave, however, not only incurred the penalty of death or of mutilation for the most trifling offence, but was not even entitled to the privilege of observing the 'mass days' in that manner which was supposed to bring man nearer to God. These days, which all freemen were expected to keep holy, were very carefully enumerated, and were more than forty in number. But slaves had days given them only when it seemed expedient to their masters; the lord had it in his power to give or not to give; and the favour, when not withheld, was most contemptuously accorded.

These distinctions of class appear most prominently in all the criminal laws, for which the clergy are responsible jointly with the lay magnates. Homicide, regarded throughout with barbarous lenity, has a descending scale of payments in accordance with the rank of the slain; other offences, regarded generally with a still more barbarous ferocity, have a scale of punishments varying with the rank of the offender, but always more savage in proportion as the criminal is more helpless. Wealth would usually purchase impunity for the thief who had offended but once. He could pay compensation and fine. A second offence, according to one set of laws, was punishable with death; but this does not appear to have been the ordinary rule—much less the provision once made that no one should be permitted to buy off his life even in the case of a first theft. It was for the free man of low estate, for the slave, and for women that the greatest atrocities were reserved. Men branded on the forehead, without hands, without feet, without tongues, lived as an example of the danger which attended the commission of petty crimes, and as a warning to all who had the misfortune of holding no higher position than that of a churl. The horrors of the Danish invasions had no tendency to mitigate these severities; and those who were chastised with whips before were chastised with scorpions afterwards. New ingenuity was brought to bear upon the art of mutilation, which was practised in every form. The eyes were plucked out; the nose, the ears, and the upper lip were cut off; the scalp was torn away; and sometimes even, there is reason to believe, the whole body was flayed alive. But in another form there was barbarism as great as this, not perhaps before the Danish incursions had commenced, but certainly before the Danish dynasty was established. It appears to have no immediate connection with the evil passions roused by the conflict of hostile races or factions, but it may, perhaps, throw some light upon the treatment of heretics and female traitors in later times. It is the condemnation to be burnt alive, which was sometimes passed upon a female slave who had been guilty of theft.

The laws in which this penalty was decreed belong to the first half of the tenth century. They seem to be less indulgent, even to free men of the higher grade, than some of the similar compilations which precede and follow them. In savageness towards slaves and women they have probably never been surpassed by the practices of the wildest tribe in Africa. They, perhaps, indicate a mad outburst against a state of lawlessness which, even in that lawless age, seemed intolerable. Among the punishments for theft are the very punishments forbidden as barbarous in the Roman Code. If the thief was a free woman she was to be thrown down a precipice or drowned (a precedent, without doubt, for dragging a witch through a pond). If the thief was a man and a slave he was to be stoned to death by eighty slaves, and if one of the eighty missed the mark three times that one was to be whipped three times. If the thief was a female slave, and had stolen from any but her own lord, eighty female slaves were to attend, bearing each a log of wood, to pile the fire and burn the offender to death.

Brutality culminating in the punishment of slaves and women.

It would be impossible to estimate, at its true value, the moral effect of such scenes as this, but they aid in explaining the cruelties of later and comparatively civilised ages. It is only wonderful that any tenderness or any mercy survived, and that the callousness of those terrible days was not transmitted to all the descendants of the men and women who were compelled to take part in such horrors. Fire, as an instrument of punishment, was, as we have seen, not unknown to the Romans, nor, perhaps, even to those whom they vanquished in Britain. But to make women the special objects of this torture, and, worse still, to teach them hardness of heart in the office of executioner, were refinements of atrocity reserved for the barbarians who planted themselves in the provinces of the Empire.

At the time when punishments for petty offences were worse than brutal, the methods by which criminals were condemned were naturally not very refined. There was no distinction between offences against the Church, on the one hand, and offences against the State or the individual, on the other. Cases of theft and coining, like those of witchcraft, could be tried in a church. From the position of the clergy, as law-givers, it followed not only that the secular laws had the sanction of religion, but that religious observances were enforced by the secular arm, if enforced at all. Not only was it declared in secular laws that cheats, and liars, and robbers would incur God's anger unless they desisted, but it was made penal to eat flesh on a fast-day, or to buy, or sell, or pursue a handicraft on Sundays or feast-days. In later times there were attempts to separate the ecclesiastical from the civil jurisdiction; but the Royal Proclamations against eating meat in Lent, and the prohibition of witchcraft by Statutes are curious instances of the persistence of an old tradition.

In these early times, if a thief was detected in the act of carrying off what he had stolen no trial was considered necessary; if a poor man, who could not pay a fine, he was put to death with little ceremony. In more doubtful cases the punishment, upon conviction, seems to have been various, and guilt or innocence was ascertained, in the case of the layman, by one of two methods of procedure—by ordeal or by compurgation. Both would be simply ludicrous but that life and limb depended on the issue. The practical effect of the one was that the accused could be saved only by the aid of the priest; the practical effect of the other, that he could be saved only by the oaths of a sufficient number of friends. The repute in which man or woman was held, either by the clergy or by the neighbours, decided the question of innocence or guilt. The popular thief was certain to be saved; the unpopular but guiltless prisoner was certain to be condemned. Fortunately for the present time no relic of these old practices survives, except the custom of calling witnesses to prove general character.

Primitive
Trials.

The form of ordeal of which the best account has been handed down is the three-fold ordeal by water. When the test was to be applied the prisoner was conducted into a church. The spectators ^{The Ordeal.} were divided into two lines, in which the numbers were equal. One line was ranged on one side of the church, the other on the other, one representing nominally the friends of the accused, the other the friends of the accuser. Between them, in the centre of the church, blazed the fire which was to purge or to blacken. All who were present were expected to be fasting and in a state of chastity. The priest passed up and down, sprinkling each with holy water, giving each holy water to taste. To each he offered the Book of the Word, and the Holy Rood, to kiss. Meanwhile the vessel of ordeal, filled with water, had been set over the fire. Four arbiters, two chosen from either side, pronounced in due time that the water boiled—that the hour was come. The rest of the congregation, who had hitherto preserved a solemn silence, now joined in prayer to Almighty God that he would make known his will in the issue. The accused advanced to the place of trial, his arm and hand swathed in fold upon fold of cloth or linen. At the bottom of the vessel, at elbow-depth, was a stone. This he had to snatch away unscathed himself, if he could, when, perhaps, he was half blinded by the smoke from the burning wood, by the steam from the seething caldron, and by the fears which must have oppressed him, whether innocent or guilty. Here ended the first act of the drama. After the expiration of three days came the final ceremony, when the bandages were unwound and the hand and arm exposed. Then, if the flesh was uninjured, it was taught that God had declared for an acquittal; but if any trace of scald appeared, the anger of heaven, it was supposed, had marked out the wrongdoer for punishment, and he suffered a sentence in accordance with the magnitude of the crime and the ferocity of the age.

There was a minor ordeal by water, called the single ordeal, in which the only material difference was that the hand alone was plunged in as far as the wrist. In the trial by hot iron, too, the ceremony was of a similar character, and the hand was protected in the same manner. The accused had to lift a piece of heated metal weighing, in the single ordeal, one pound, in the three-fold ordeal, three pounds. The burn or the absence of a burn, after three days, proved guilt or innocence. Another test, and one possibly more favourable to the criminal, was the 'corsnæd,' which appears to have been reserved for the clergy. This was no more than consecrated bread or cheese. He who could swallow it unharmed was innocent, he who failed was guilty.

In all these ordeals the clergy had the entire control not only of the final ceremonies but of the preliminary arrangements, upon which the issue must, in a great measure, have depended. They prepared the 'corsnæd,' and it is quite conceivable that bread might have been so prepared as to prove guilt; they had the accused under their care for three days before the trial. The priest enjoined a fast of three days; the priest administered the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; under the direction of the priest the hand and arm of the person to be tried were enveloped in the coverings which gave the only chance of acquittal by the hot water or the hot iron. The enemy of the Church or of the priest must have fared but ill in the proof by ordeal. But the priest was, in some cases, permitted to exculpate himself on far easier terms, by simply making oath on the 'housel' or sacramental bread.

In graver charges, however, it was necessary, even for an ecclesiastic, to find some fellow ecclesiastics who were willing to swear precisely as he swore. ^{Compurgation.} This process was extended to the layman, who, if not friendless, could escape the ordeal. He had but to find a sufficient number of compurgators, or fellow-clearers, who would make oath with him that he was innocent. The compurgation, like the ordeal, varied according to the nature of the accusation, and with the rank of the offenders. In some cases a greater, in others a less, number of compurgators was required; but in every case they called the Lord to witness that the oath of the person whom they had to support was clean and unperjured.

Of the two methods of trial perhaps the ordeal was the less demoralising to the laity. To them (whatever may have been its effect upon the clergy) it was only one form of superstition the more—a ^{Its demoralising effects.} matter of little moment where the forms of superstition were already numberless. But compurgation, on the other hand, could hardly have been better than organised and recognised perjury. It rarely happens to any one to have certain knowledge of his own that another has not committed any definite crime ; never, indeed, except when he has been present at the time of alleged perpetration, and has seen either that the deed was not of the nature supposed, or was not done by the person to be exculpated. In some rare cases it is possible that all the compurgators may have had this justification, and may so have been by chance good witnesses for the defence. But from the fact that a fixed number of compurgators was always required it is obvious that the swearing was a formality, and that the idea of evidence in our modern sense was not entertained. Sometimes, without doubt, the swearers may have believed, from the general character of the accused, that he must have been innocent of the particular offence with which he was charged. This is the most favourable interpretation of which their oath is susceptible, but is not the natural signification of their words. They verbally, at least, swore to the fact, and not simply to their belief ; in short, they swore that which they did not know to be true.

It has sometimes been supposed that out of the system of compurgation sprang our Trial by Jury. The Its relation to Trial by Jury. opinion is not altogether without foundation, but the relationship is not that of mother and child. There are various links which connect the jury with the band of compurgators on the one hand, and with the fellow-swearers, who were in certain cases called upon to support the accuser, on the other. This subject will be discussed in a future chapter. It is here only necessary to point out the ill effects produced by asking a number of persons to swear that every statement made by another person is true. Bad customs are easily handed down from generation to generation ; and in the system of compurgation is to be found the origin of those perjuries which, even in comparatively modern times, were the subject of most bitter complaint. It was long held an impossibility to obtain a true verdict even from a London jury.

With the practice of compurgation was intimately connected another institution which lies at the root of the whole of the early system of police in England.

This was the Guild, which at various times assumed various forms, but which, in every form, involved the principle of association, either

*Police system.
The Guild compulsory and voluntary. The Peace-pledge.*

voluntary or compulsory. In the earliest form in which we have any notice of it under that name, it must have been compulsory—so far, indeed, as the law had any power to compel. The payment of a sum of money in cases of homicide, according to the rank of the person slain, has already been noticed as a prominent custom among the Teutonic settlers in Britain. The person liable, in the first instance, was of course the slayer, and, in accordance with the importance attached to the family tie, his kin were also liable with him. The death, in fact, constituted a family feud between the relatives of the slayer and the relatives of the slain, who were to satisfy or be satisfied by blood or by money. Sometimes, however, it happened that the relatives of the slayer were unable to find the sum necessary to exculpate him; sometimes he was kinless, and sometimes the person slain had no kin who were entitled to receive compensation. To meet these contingencies, which in the one case would have led to further bloodshed, and in the others would have rendered the law nugatory, there was enforced a species of artificial family bond which completed the circle of mutual liability. Certain sections of the population were joined together in guilds, which aided the homicide who had no kin to pay his penalty, and which received a portion of the fine when one of their own body was the victim.

It is not, indeed, quite certain whether, in the first instance, guilds of this kind were associations to one of which every free man was compelled to belong, or were merely subsidiary to the great family bond, and applied only to those whom no family owned. There would, however, have been great practical difficulties in bringing the kinless together; and it is more probable that the guild, in this sense, was an association which the law directed every one of a certain rank to join, either in his own person or by his representative—the head of the family. This it certainly was eventually, when it appeared as the tithing, in which all free men below a certain rank, whether in town or country, were compelled to be numbered.

The Tithing consisted of ten men, who were collectively responsible for the good behaviour of every member. A crime perpetrated by any one of The Tithing, and the Hundred. them rendered the whole liable to that form of punishment which, next to mutilation and death by torture, is most prominent in all Teutonic laws—a payment of goods or money. The Hundred, though in all historical times a territorial division, was, perhaps, originally a guild of a hundred freemen, just as the tithing was a guild of ten. The distinction between responsibility shared by the inhabitants of a district, because they were its inhabitants, and responsibility shared by a definite number of persons, who of course inhabited a definite district, is far too fine to have any persistence in barbarous times. Speculation on this subject would, however, be profitless. The essential fact is perfectly well established, that when any offence had been committed, there was a responsibility incurred in the first instance by the offender, but ascending, so far as the pecuniary penalty was concerned, from individual to family and association, until the means of bearing the burden had been found.

Each of these associations had its head man or president ; and, even after the Norman Conquest, each particular tithing or 'frank-pledge' was known by the name of its chief. There was also for the hundred a kind of court which, so far as matters of police are concerned, was identical with the Court of the Manor. Indeed, if it were not clear beyond all dispute that private jurisdictions existed before the Norman Conquest, it might almost be inferred that some lords of manors soon after that time usurped the power and the functions of the hundred-man. Theoretically, the right of inspecting the tithings, or, in other words, 'the view of frank-pledge,' with the various incidents of that ceremony, belonged at one time to the hundred ; practically, it was, not very long after the Norman Conquest, an ordinary appurtenance of a manor. The tithing, however, in its relation to the hundred and to the territorial division, which in the end was called a manor, left not a single person in the realm (outlaws excepted) who did not, either directly or indirectly, give some kind of security to the state for his good behaviour. The landed magnate, it is possible, was, to use modern phraseology, only bound in his own recognisances—gave no security but the stake which he held in the country for himself and his household. The rest were not only compelled to find bail for themselves, but themselves to be bail for their own sureties.

Such was the institution which went by the name of the Peace-pledge. It was, perhaps, not established in full force until the Danes became masters of England, in the beginning of the eleventh century. But the responsibility of the guild is mentioned in laws as early as the end of the seventh century, and can be traced downwards to the time when it had become an elaborate system of police. It is true that, in the intermediate period, the simpler plan of exacting bail when a particular offence had been committed was not unknown. The custom of reciprocal warranty may, therefore, have been put in force and abandoned alternately in a series of vain attempts to reform the criminal tendencies of the population. Nor is it impossible that the law may have required specific bail for each person accused of a particular crime, in addition to the responsibility already incurred by the guild or tithing to which he belonged. The necessity, however, which the Danes felt very keenly, of having some security against assassination by their subjects, caused them to define the law of Peace-pledge with clearness, and to enforce it with rigour. The free-man who could not name his tithing and his hundred was then an outlaw ; his kin had no claim to compensation if he was killed ; if accused himself he could not be exculpated by compurgation.

In the penalty attached to the neglect of this law may be discerned a clue to the weakness of a system which, at first sight, appears to render crime impossible. There is evidently a connexion between the compurgators and the tithing or hundred. The man who will not take upon himself the responsibilities of the peace-bond forfeits all the advantages of

Full development of the system under the Danes.

Its inherent weakness.

the family-bond, and, of course, of the peace-bond itself. One of the advantages of the latter, there can be little doubt, was, that the fellow tithing-men, or fellow hundred-men could, upon occasion, make oath for a comrade. If they swore to his innocence, or their belief in it, the effect was that the accused person escaped, and that his peace-union did not pay. If they declined to swear, they not only exposed him to the dangers of the ordeal, or worse, but they practically taxed themselves for his offence. Thus, the Peace-pledge, though it apparently constituted every man a constable, had really the opposite effect of setting a reward on perjury.

It is not, however, necessary to suppose that any man's compurgators, as a body, were strictly identical with any particular peace-union, though his peace-union must almost certainly have furnished some of his compurgators. The Guilds and the Compurgators. If the tithing and the hundred were guilds in which men were associated by compulsion, there were others in which they were associated by choice. The rules of some of these, as they existed before the Norman Conquest, are still extant. Like the others, they exhibit the principle of mutual insurance, which, however, is developed into the principle of mutual aid in times of trouble. The brothers, as the members were called, contributed to bear the burden when the house of one of their number was burnt. They helped to pay the fine when one of them had committed a homicide. They all had an affectionate interest for one who had the misfortune to find himself in prison. They met at stated seasons for convivial entertainments; and there can be little doubt that they were held together by a tie only less strong than that of the family itself. They professed, it is true, to respect the law, and to draw a distinction between accidental or justifiable homicide, and that which in modern times would be called murder. But as they would probably not have been permitted to enjoy their organisation if they had not shown this apparent spirit of obedience, there is little importance to be attached to it in the face of other well-established facts.

The effect of this double system of guilds upon the system of compurgation may readily be imagined, especially when the country was in the hands of the foreigner. To screen an offender would be, according to the social code, an act of good fellowship, according to the political code, remunerative. Thus two of the strongest motives by which human beings can be influenced were brought into action, not, as the law-givers intended, for the repression of crime, but for the escape of the criminal. The results will be made apparent, not only in the history of the time at which these institutions were most prominent, but unfortunately also in the history of many subsequent centuries.

In the present age—when the use of the dagger is called in ordinary speech un-English, when assassination is described as the crime of the foreigner or of the Irishman—it is difficult to realise the fact that England itself was once considered almost a land of assassins. In the year 1002 the massacre of the Danes in cold blood, in time of peace, gave the subsequent Danish dynasty good reason to fear the temper of their subjects and to look well to the perfection of the Peace-pledge. Even if it were possible to disbelieve the chronicle in which this terrible event is narrated, and to assume that the words were written half a century after the date assigned to them, the story would still be a monument of the morals which rendered those times hideous. In this year, calmly reports the annalist, on Saint Brice's Day, by the King's command, the whole of the Danes in England were slain. There is a feeble attempt to justify the deed by reference to some plot which the victims might otherwise have carried into execution. But not one expression of reprobation, or even of regret, is there to soften the hard outline of the tale; there is reason, on the contrary, to believe that the act of murder could not have been so general as the chronicler represents, and that he deliberately exaggerated its magnitude in order to make it appear more creditable to his country!

The Guilds
and the Assassins.

No wonder, then, that when retribution came, and England fell under the yoke of the Danes, the new rulers strained to the utmost the responsibility of the hundred, in which they might well have believed some security was to be found. But the Dane, like the Norman, must have discovered that the system of guilds was a stronger support to the homicide than to the arm of the law. He did not, like the Norman, draw a distinction between those who were akin to the victors and those who were akin to the vanquished, nor provide that the hundred should be responsible for deaths by violence in one class only. At most, therefore, he could but have obtained for his fellow-countrymen a protection from murder as great as that which was enjoyed by the native population. How great that was it is not difficult to infer even from the meagre annals of the time. As the petty kings of earlier days commonly perished by assassination, so the magnates of the eleventh century, when obnoxious to their rivals, were killed with little hesitation and with little blame to the slayer. A fine and a temporary banishment satisfied the law and appeased the anger of the king. Respect for human life is a sentiment which had no place in the tenth century or the eleventh. Nor when the Englishman remembers the deeds which his forefathers did, not only before the Norman Conquest but long after, has he any reason for the Pharisaical belief that his nature is not as the nature of an Irishman.

Thus far the guild has been regarded in only two of its aspects—as the police-guild and as the social guild. Trade-guilds and the Towns. It has, however, another, and in later times, more familiar aspect—as the trading-guild. How one sprang from another, or which was the first in origin, it would, perhaps, be impossible to determine with certainty. The trading-guild appears in more forms than one—as the guild merchant, which it is difficult to distinguish from the town-corporation, and as the guild of craftsmen. The craft-guilds do not come into notice before the Norman Conquest, but, on the other hand, they show themselves soon afterwards, and there seems to be no good reason for denying them any previous existence. An antiquity, extending at least as far back as the time of Edward the Confessor, is claimed for the guild merchant, and allowed, in the later charters to some of the towns; the Guild-hall of the burgesses at Dover, and the Guild of burgesses at Canterbury are mentioned in Domesday-Book. In the earliest record of the Exchequer after Domesday, the guilds of weavers appear to be regularly constituted and perfectly familiar to the revenue officers. Rude as were the earlier times, it is certain that even gold-workers attained some skill in England, and it can hardly be supposed that the country was destitute of weavers. And if it be admitted on the one hand that there were handicraftsmen, and on the other hand that guilds were established for various purposes, it is very difficult to believe that the guild principle was not applied to the trades. If so much be conceded the priority of any of the three forms of guild becomes a mere matter of conjecture, and the source of the whole system must necessarily remain doubtful. Regarded from one point of view, the guild has a strong resemblance to the family tie of the Teutonic and other barbarous tribes; regarded from another, it is a species of bail, which involves a principle too universally applied to be considered characteristic of any one people; regarded from a third, it is strikingly like that institution of colleges or companies which was always familiar to the Romans, and which we know from inscriptions to have existed in Britain during the Roman occupation, both in the form of the religious guild and in the form of the craft-guild.

It would be possible, indeed, to elaborate a very plausible argument for the development of the whole guild system out of Roman institutions rather than out of the family tie of the Germans. This, indeed, might have come to pass by two wholly distinct processes—either through a tradition handed down by the ancient Roman townsmen, or through a new introduction at the time when Roman missionaries came to restore Christianity in that part of Britain which had become pagan England. The second process would fully account for the existence of guilds in parts of Germany never conquered by the Romans. Human nature, however, whether civilised or barbarous—Greek, or Roman, or Teutonic—has everywhere some kind of social instinct; and the common historical blunder of attributing to a race, or a country, or a language that which belongs to humanity shall, in this place at least, not be repeated. The truth is that the guild system existed before and after the Norman Conquest, but that there is no historical evidence of its beginning. It is, however, a fact of too much importance to be forgotten that the guilds afterwards became, for a time, in one form at least, the vital principle of the towns.

In the History of Crime, and of its varying forms, the history of towns and of commerce must play a conspicuous part. In the occupations of the people lie their temptations; by those occupations, in a great measure, the moral standard of society is formed. With the growth of the peaceful arts crimes of violence disappear; when government is unsettled, and men are familiar with war, life falls in value, and murder ceases to be regarded as a heinous offence. To the Englishman, who lives securely in the greatest cities which the world has seen, the small beginnings of modern civilisation have a special interest and importance. The struggle of the warlike spirit against the trading spirit, of ignorance against knowledge, of brute force against the inventive faculties, might be described as the struggle of crime against social order, had social order, in the modern sense, existed when the conflict was at its height.

Those who believe that the Roman towns survived the Teutonic invasion will date the beginning of the campaign from that all-important event. They will see in the contempt of the lord for the trader the inherited contempt of the victor for the vanquished. They will see in the persistence of the Importance of the history of Towns in the History of Crime.

Disputed origin of Towns in England.

townsmen a stubbornness inherited from the time when townsmen drove back the invader from the walls, and yielded at last only to the necessities of hunger. But it is the duty of the historian not to put forward as fact that which is mere possibility. There is no evidence that the towns were destroyed. There is a statement made by a monk that a few were at a particular time deserted. There is the fact that at no period of history had towns ceased to exist or to be inhabited in any of the great divisions of England. Beyond this all is conjecture. There are, however, some materials upon which an opinion may be formed, and which, if they are not conclusive upon the question of origin, are not without their value for the main objects of this work. The towns, as they existed before the Norman Conquest, must be regarded in their relation to the known customs of pure Teutonic tribes, as well as to the territorial divisions, and to the tenure of land which prevailed in England when Southern Britain had acquired that name.

From the northern walls to the Straits of Dover, the names of Roman stations were adopted by the conquerors. Where the Roman had raised walls and dug trenches the new possessor of the soil described the fortress in language more Roman than that of the Roman himself. The legions of the Empire, when they settled in a British town, accepted commonly enough the British designation. To them Isca, Venta, and Glevum were enough; to their successors it seemed necessary to add the Roman word 'castra,' or chester; and the same places became Exanceaster or Exeter, Wintanceaster or Winchester, Gleawanceaster or Gloucester. Of these chesters nearly sixty have survived names: the Chesters.

Roman

to the present day. Bath and St. Albans were chesters centuries after the departure of the Romans, the first being called Bathanceaster, or Acemannesceaster, the second both Verlamacaestir and Vaetlingacaestir. Other chesters again, of which the sites cannot now be indentified, are mentioned in various writings between the eighth and eleventh centuries. Some important places, however, retained their Roman names without the addition of chester, or, as in the case of Bath, without a fixed and permanent addition. Among these were York (sometimes called Eoforwic-ceaster), and Dover. Lincoln, or Lindocolonia, is the Roman 'colonia' of Lindum. London was known as London in the time of the Emperor Claudius, and as London it has always been known, except when the Romans honoured it, for its magnitude, with the additional title of Augusta.

The persistence of the word 'chester' in every part of England is the more remarkable from the fact that when Britain returns again into the light of history the land is not in the power of a single chieftain or tribe, but is divided into many independent kingdoms, which long continued to wage war one against another. They had no tie but that of a common language, which, however, exhibits some variations of dialect in the different districts. It has been believed, from the days of Hume to our own time, by historians whose works entitle them to respect, that, when South Britain was conquered by the Low German tribes, the process was one of complete extermination. Others, and among them Gibbon, have entertained a very different opinion, have admitted that the evidence upon which the belief is founded is wholly unworthy of credit, and that all the analogies to be found in Europe point to a different question which involves a long train of scientific reasoning. Even a summary of the arguments upon either side would be out of all proportion to the value which any result would possess for the objects of this history. A critical examination of the historical authorities, a careful estimate of the value of language as a criterion of race, a discussion of various anatomical and psychological problems, an investigation of the length of time required to effect a change of physical characteristics by means of climate and soil are all necessary branches of such an enquiry. This is, therefore, not the place to deny that although the German barbarians, when they had but the Rhine to cross, failed to extirpate the Gauls, they could cross the German Ocean in sufficient numbers to extirpate the Britons. Still less would it be worth while to enquire by what means the invaders discovered the names of the Roman stations after they had slain the only persons who could give them the information. Least of all would it be profitable to combat the opinion that we should attribute to mere coincidence such facts as the existence of a chief city, at the time of the Norman Conquest, upon the site and with the name of a chief city known to the Romans, and the apparent identity of Winchester, the city of second importance, with a Roman city which bore a British name.

There is, however, one point upon which those who regard the Teutonic wave as a deluge may agree with those who regard it as a wave and nothing more. Even if it be supposed that the invaders, after putting the inhabitants to death, left not one stone upon another in any town which they found in the island, it must nevertheless be admitted that the towns were sooner or later rebuilt. One of three possible cases must be accepted as fact : new towns were built with the ancient name on or near the ancient site, or new inhabitants occupied the towns, of which the former possessors were slaughtered, wholly or in part, or the original possessors retained their hold after the new comers had settled round about them. These are the limits of conjecture ; history gives but one fact to aid it :—towns bearing their Roman names existed when Bede, the first historian, began to write, nearly three hundred years after the date which has commonly been assigned to the mythical voyage of Hengist and Horsa. Every one may imagine the events of the intervening period according to his own wishes or prejudices, for it may be shown that the history of our towns begins at the same point whether we accept the Roman or the Teuton as the founder.

The marauders who commonly gave the name of 'chester' to the walled towns, which excited their wonder, sometimes substituted 'byrig' or 'burh' (the Teutonic names : the Boroughs. modern borough) for that term. Thus, London was sometimes called Lundenbyrig ; and while Kent retained its ancient name its capital became Cantwara-byrig. In early times the word borough was borne by few towns as a portion of their names, but it became, as it could hardly fail to do when the language of the Romans ceased to be spoken, the generic term for every walled town. It started from very humble beginnings. It seems at one time to have denoted a hill, or a rude earthwork such as the primitive Teuton threw up as a defence against a hostile tribe. Afterwards it was used to express a more solid and permanent fort or tower, of which the Burghs in the Shetland Islands may be mentioned as specimens. Later still its signification was extended to that of a castle or walled town of any extended to that of a castle or walled town of any dimensions. And finally, in the long conflict with feudalism, it gained the complex meaning which we now attach to it.

The history, therefore, of the Teutonic Borough and the history of the Roman Chester are one. Both alike carry us back to the most primitive form of society. A savage tribe has a quarrel with a neighbouring tribe, and makes its first step towards civilisation when it imitates artificially the natural mound behind which it has found shelter. Out of the mound grows the idea of systematic intrenchment on the one hand and of turret-building on the other. From the savage tribe with its 'pah' grows the military nation with its 'castra.' The 'castra,' at first only a temporary camp, must of necessity develope in time into the permanent camp, with all its wants and its offers of employment. Out of the permanent camp grows the walled town; out of the walled town the city with its civilisation. Such must have been the history of Rome, such the history of London. This fact has a far more direct bearing upon the History of Crime than the question whether our blood is British, or Roman, or German. And there is not a doubt that if the Teutonic invaders learned the art of building towns and castle walls from the Romanised Britons, they had, before the Norman Conquest, applied it to new sites and modified it according to their own rude ideas.

The origin of the Roman Chester and of the Teutonic Borough the same.

The condition of the towns before the Norman Conquest is involved in much obscurity. We have no means, except where walls still exist, of ascertaining their magnitude during the Roman occupation; but the remains of temples, baths, pavements, and amphitheatres, with innumerable coins, indicate that all the civilisation of the empire had been imported into Britain. Such as the municipal constitution was elsewhere the Theodosian Code tells us it was in this island ; but whether this constitution was handed down to the Teutonic invaders, or the invaders created a municipal organisation of their own, is a question which cannot be decided with historical certainty. It is easy to represent the borough as the counterpart of the shire, with similar officers and a similar system throughout. It is easy to represent the shire as the equivalent of the 'Gau' found elsewhere—as an aggregate of Teutonic tribes—and to trace the whole pre-Norman Government, by a series of analogies, back to the primitive barbarism in which the Germans lived according to the account of Tacitus. But it would be no less easy to represent the officers of these boroughs as officers of the Roman city, called by a Teutonic translation of their Roman name. The counterpart of the town would then be found in the shire ; the officers and the organisation of the shire could then be represented as borrowed from the town, and the men who owed suit to the County Court, as imitators of the Roman decurions.

Relation of the Town to the Shire.

While, however, it is thus easy to heap conjecture upon conjecture, there is one fact in the relations of town to shire which may, perhaps, afford an indication of the power possessed by towns at a very early period. In the midst of all the disputes of antiquaries it is certain that the shire did not commonly give its name to the town, and that, in a very large number of instances, the town gave a name to the shire. York, Lincoln, Leicester, Chester, Worcester, Gloucester have not only preserved in their names the recollection of Roman influence, but have extended them to the shires which constitute a very large portion of England. Even where the name of the town is not Roman, whatever may have been its origin, the same principle is seen in operation; and the only exceptions to the ordinary rule of nomenclature are found in the few shires retaining the name of some settlers who at one time enjoyed an independent government.

The German of the time of Cæsar and of the time of Tacitus hated the very thought of living in a town. His ideas of life, virtue, and happiness were simple. To fight an enemy and carry off plunder, to make himself drunk when the battle was over, to remain drunk so long as the spoils afforded him the means, and then to fight and drink again—these were the objects of existence, and to attain them in perfection was to be a good man and true. Work of any kind he considered degrading to his noble nature, fit only for slaves and women and children. He dwelt sometimes in a cave, sometimes in a hut plastered over with mud. He despised architecture; and mortar and tiles were unknown to him. A shapeless log of timber for a wall when he built a hovel, dung to keep him warm when he descended into his cavern, some flocks and herds, out of which he might pay a fine when he had committed a murder, a horse and arms, with which he might go to battle, were all the luxuries which he desired. This, according to Tacitus, was a human being of a far higher type than the civilised, but corrupt, Roman; this, according to others, was the builder of our towns, the founder of modern society. It matters, however, but little whether it is to him or to the Roman that we are to look for the beginning of our civilisation; it is but a question of a few centuries. The Roman himself did

Contrast between the primitive Teuton and the Town-builder.

but pass a little earlier through the stage of barbarism in which he found the Teuton.

One of the most important points in which the rulers of England before the Norman Conquest differed from the primitive Germans of Tacitus was the use of coin. Among the scanty notices which we possess of the towns during this period not the least important are those which show that they had the privileges of the Mint, or were compelled to undertake its duties. Thus it happens that in the early Institutes of England we find human life appraised not in horses and cattle, but in shillings and pence. This, perhaps, may be regarded as the second stage of civilisation. But, though in itself only one step above the custom which it succeeds, it is a step which could hardly have been made without the operation of causes wholly distinct from any which are known to have existed in the social or political organisation of the Teutonic tribe itself. There is no need for coins where there are no towns and no commerce ; and to the primitive Teuton town-life seemed to be nothing less than pollution. It is true, that wherever he was brought into contact with Roman civilisation he immediately abandoned his prejudices and possessed himself of money as often as opportunity offered. There is no doubt that on the continent the great change in the conditions of life which is implied in the adoption of a coinage was effected for the German through the influence of the Roman. Analogy points to a similar process in Britain ; and there must have been either a similar process or one which it is far less easy to comprehend. But in the absence of all documents which deserve to be called historical, it would be unsafe to make a definite historical statement. The facts which are known with certainty are few in number and separated by wide intervals of time. They may be summed up in a sentence. The Germans when free from external influence had no cities, no trade, no objects of barter except flocks and herds, nothing but live stock with which they could even pay a penalty; the Romans left Britain with numerous towns, with flourishing arts, and with a coinage; some centuries later the governing powers used a Low German dialect and paid their penalties, sometimes at least, in money coined in towns, which were still numerous, and many of which were still more or less Roman in name. The art of coining was not introduced by Augustine or by his foreign successors, because there are in existence coins belonging to the period between the Teutonic invasion and the coming of the Roman missionaries.

The Teuton
in possession of a coinage.

In Britain, as elsewhere, the possession of towns and of money was necessarily accompanied by another element of civilisation—a tax for the common good. The Teuton in possession of walls, bridges, and roads. Wherever the Teuton gained possession of a fragment of the Roman Empire, a species of tenure began to prevail which was not only unlike any known to the ancient Germans, but founded on a principle altogether opposed to their primitive ideas. Having been previously a hater of towns, he imposed upon all the lands which he acquired the burden of maintaining town-walls or castles as well as the bridges and roads which sustained the communication from one town to another. It is, indeed, difficult to understand how the roads could have continued to be used if the towns which they connected had been destroyed. The fact, however, that the Roman roads were adopted by the successors of the Romans is not to be disputed; and in that fact lay, during many centuries, almost the only hope that civilisation might one day be revived in Britain.

The discordance which may be observed between these indications of a more advanced civilisation and the barbarity of the criminal law assumed also a variety of other forms, and affected both town and country. When the Teuton began to permit the existence of towns, and even to live in them himself, he began to understand that an individual might possess, in addition to horses, cattle, and sheep, some property of his own as distinguished from the common stock, and that such possession might extend to land as well as to manufactured goods and coin. But the traditional method of dividing land, which has been acquired by force, could not be at once thrown aside; and thus when England first appears in history, after the Teutonic conquest, her soil is divided in a manner which shows a conflict still hardly decided between the primitive notion that land belongs to no one, or to the tribe, and the notion that one man may hold a portion of it if he can.

That land, which has been acquired by an unsettled tribe through a common effort, should be held in common is a natural consequence of the mode of acquisition.

Change in his views with respect to land-tenure. The custom has existed among the Aryan-speaking nations from the Indian Ocean to the Atlantic. But it has been by no means restricted to a race or a language. When the Israelites entered the Promised Land a division was made into as many portions as there were tribes to claim a share; and in America, before it was conquered by the European nations, it is said that the Aztecs held their land in common, tribe by tribe. In the village-communities of India little or no progress has, even now, been made beyond this primitive state of society. Elsewhere it has been followed by a complete or partial subdivision, among individuals, in the first instance of arable land and afterwards of grass-land and wood-land. But the original barbarism has seldom failed to leave a trace in the practices of civilised life ; and thus common of pasture was an institution familiar alike to Italians and provincials who lived under the Roman Empire, and to the churls and serfs who lived immediately before the Norman Conquest, as it is to the peasants of our own day.

Land held in common by every primitive tribe.

The Germans, in early times, constituted no exception to this general rule. Among them a 'mark' was a ring of waste or forest surrounding a community, The Teutonic 'Mark' and Tribe. which tilled, by means of its slaves, as much arable land as was sufficient for its own support. Over the waste or forest the families constituting the tribe or clan had common rights. In the central arable land each had a severalty, or individual proprietorship, which was apparently shifting, rather than permanent or hereditary, in the time of Tacitus. It is probable, however, that each head of a family had, as soon as tillage became a recognised institution, a right to a certain definite measure of arable land for the support of himself and those who were dependent on him. But the fertility of any particular plot would, when the principles of agriculture were unknown, soon be exhausted ; he would thus be compelled to occupy different spots at different times.

This species of shifting severalty is the intermediate stage between possession in common and hereditary possession by private persons. It is, from the nature of the case, excessively difficult to pronounce where one begins and the other ends. Stage between tenure in common and tenure in severalty. The line which distinguishes the right to a particular section of land of a particular size from the right to a section of land of a particular size but not in a particular spot is so dimly drawn that it cannot be followed in its whole length. It is probable, however, that when men discovered the advantage of letting lands lie fallow, and when there was an abundance of land to divide, the head of the family received an allotment sufficiently large to support him and his, not only for one year, but permanently. As soon as this was done, whenever it may have been, the shifting severalty had given place to a severalty in permanence, and a blow, apparently slight but really severe, had been struck at the whole principle of tenure in common.

In England, after the Teutonic invasion, there seems to have been recognised a common property in land in two different senses. There was a common right of mast, turbary, and pasture in the unenclosed lands; and there were, at the same time, lands called 'folc-land,' which belonged to the state, but which, before the Norman Conquest, the state could grant for a life or lives, and even in perpetuity, as the reward of good service. By degrees, however, the common land diminished in quantity as parts of it became the property of individuals; and with the land the allodial lord acquired many of the privileges and functions which had previously been entrusted to the elect of the tribal assembly. •

For this reason, as well as others, it has been suggested that the great land-holder—the lord of the manor—was developed out of an elected, and afterwards hereditary, head man of the tribe or clan. In some instances it is probable enough that this was his origin, but the principle must not be carried too

Common
land in England.

Origin of the private land-holder.

far. The early existence of towns, whatever their origin, and the adoption of the Roman roads preclude the possibility that the system of living in isolated tribes, surrounded by a mark, could have been universal. There were, without doubt, waste lands and forests in abundance, yet their continuity had been broken by the Roman engineers and the builders of the Roman towns. The great lord, therefore, though he may sometimes have been no more than the hereditary head man of his tribe, may also have sprung sometimes from a different source. When the invaders from Germany effected a settlement in Britain it is not improbable that some of the chieftains, with their select companions, may have imitated the customs of those whom they dispossessed in taking a share of the soil, and perhaps even a villa to themselves apart from their followers of a lower grade. This, however, is a matter of little moment. The ancestors of the Romans had, no doubt, once been nomad tribes, enjoying their hunting grounds in common. They had passed through phases of life to which the Teuton was yet a stranger, but which seem inevitable in the existence of every people capable of civilisation.

Acquisition by force, in one form or another, either by individuals or by communities, constitutes the first title to all land in England. And where all inherited the traditions of those who believed that acquisition was meritorious, and not least meritorious where most violent, community naturally became no less jealous of community than lord of lord, or petty king of petty king. The spirit of invasion, handed down from the past, infected the whole of society from its greatest divisions to its least. War was its normal condition—if not the war of the little, the Acquisition

by force the first and long the best title to land.

war of the great. Where the local customs of one place differed from those of another in all respects but one, they at least agreed in recognising the rule of the strongest; and though the idea of peace throughout the realm did somehow become possible to the rulers, and an attempt was made to secure order by the peace-pledge or system of mutual bail, nature and habit proved far stronger than law. The very mode of settlement adopted by the invaders and their descendants must have given increased energy to the old love of combat. The great owners became the natural enemies of those who held state lands for a term, or who had common rights, and those who had common rights the natural enemies of the great owners. All were alike ready to encroach or to resist an encroachment; and even in far later times it will be seen that a township would sometimes assert a petty privilege by force. Out of these conflicting elements grew many of the anomalies of land-tenure which have descended to our own time, and especially the manor, with the various common rights claimed by the tenants.

It has been well remarked by one of the greatest admirers of Teutonic institutions that the right of private war was the foundation of Teutonic (he might have added of all semi-barbarous) laws. That, together with the blood-tie, produced the system of compensation for murder. That was, in theory, asserted equally by the lowest freeman and the greatest lord. That, however, it was which took the little power they possessed from the weak and gave it to the strong. That, represented as the free-man's inheritance, was precisely what converted the free-man into a dependent. That was long the greatest obstacle to personal liberty, with the right of private

Connexion
war.

the support of slavery, the greatest discouragement to industry, the enemy of all order, and even of strict military discipline. But that was the privilege which the great holder could assert on a great scale. He could insist on the appeal to arms against a neighbouring lord, or against the king. He would accept a grant of the public land or folc-land from the King and Witan, and consent to have it elevated to the rank of book-land, or land of which the ownership was certified in writing. But he trusted little to the security of books; and long after the Norman Conquest he would take by violence his neighbour's land, and the parchments which proved his neighbour's rights. He would submit to the decision of that which has been called a court—if it happened to be in his own favour. But the strong arm gave a better title than any deed of grant or court of thanes; and the primitive mode of taking possession was neither forgotten nor allowed to fall into disuse for many centuries after the time now under consideration. It seems indeed that out of the first barbarous seizure of the soil grew one of the maxims of the common law—that actual entry is necessary to possession. Thence came the forcible entries of later times, which statutes long failed to repress, and which would never have been repressed had not a power stronger than legislation come to its aid.

Thus, sooner or later, the descendant of the rude marauder began life as a great landholder, prepared to retain by the sword that which the sword had won for him, and by the sword to win still more if he could. Thus the smaller holders were, in those lawless times, altogether swallowed up by the greater, or only permitted to exist by a sacrifice of independence. Thus it came to pass that there were king-makers before the Earl of Warwick, and even before the Norman Conquest—that a Godwin was not less powerful in relation to the king than any of the strictly feudal barons. The power which could be used to raise or depose a king was, in fact, only the territorial power which a lord, or a combination of lords, could wield against another lord, or another combination.

Within a society such as was the clan within its mark, such as are village communities in India, there were necessarily, as indeed there are in every savage tribe, the rudiments of a court of law. If the chief did not treat all his inferiors as slaves, and exercise absolute power over limb and life, there was an elected head-man who presided at certain assemblies in which matters affecting the community were discussed. The disputes of those who held adjoining plots of land, and such petty thefts as it was possible to commit in a society so little advanced, were brought before him. In this, of course, it is easy to point out an analogy not only to the hundred court, but also to the manor court of later times. Not the least important, indeed, of the powers acquired by the private landholder was that of private jurisdiction. Little is known of its history before the time of the Norman Conquest. But the technical terms which the conquerors were compelled to adopt, which belong to the language of the vanquished, and which remain untranslated in the Latin treatises of the Norman lawyers, give sufficient evidence of the institution. The gallows for hanging men, and the pit for drowning or half-drowning women, were among the most cherished appurtenances of the manor, or of its prototype, as it existed before the year 1066. The lord set great value upon his privilege of holding his own court, and not less upon his privilege of hanging his own thieves. Even when the offender had committed a theft without the limits of the land held by his lord, it seems to have been in some places an established custom that he was to be brought back and hanged upon the gallows which his lord had provided for him.

Origin of Private Jurisdictions.

These private jurisdictions were so numerous as to form a conspicuous feature in Domesday Book, which shows not only that the lord of the manor had his equivalent before the Norman Conquest, but ^{their diffusion in town and country.} that the principle which he exemplifies had extended itself even into the towns. Stamford and Lincoln had each twelve magistrates with power (in the case of Lincoln at least hereditary) to hold their own courts. In Norwich, Canterbury, Huntingdon, Hereford, and other towns, private individuals had a still more independent authority. The two largest towns, London and Winchester, are not mentioned in the record, but their subsequent history indicates that they were not, at the time of the Norman Conquest, free from the curse of little lords with their little tribunals. A right of trying criminals was attached to the ownership of Baynard's Castle in London in the time of John, and claimed long afterwards by the descendants of Robert Fitz-Walter. Not the least of the privileges which he enjoyed was that of drowning in the Thames all traitors taken within the limits of his territory.

It cannot be satisfactorily decided by direct evidence how far the towns themselves, in their municipal capacity, possessed jurisdiction before the Norman Conquest. There was, however, in every borough ^{Municipal Jurisdictions.} a moot or court which probably resembled that of the hundred, and had power at least to give judgment on minor offences. In the towns, as in the rural districts, the peace-pledge was rigorously exacted, and there must have been some power similar to the hundred court to inspect each union of ten. The towns, like the counties and hundreds, had their reeve, a part of whose functions was, in all likelihood, to preside, or at least to take a prominent place, in some kind of court. It is worthy of remark, too, that in London, the wards, of which the constitution must have been long anterior to the Norman Conquest, act afterwards precisely as the hundreds act in criminal enquiries.

None of the courts of which there is any trace before the Norman Conquest afford any indication that they were governed by fixed principles, that they observed Feebleness of the higher jurisdictions. uniformity of procedure, or that any legal knowledge was required in the persons who presided over them. To the last, every shire was a little kingdom in itself, jealous of its own local privileges. The Bishop, with the chief lay officer in each, sat twice a year to transact the chief judicial business of the district. Their court was called a meeting, which certain inhabitants of the shire were expected to attend. They had, in a certain sense, cognisance of the greater criminal offences, and decided civil causes, so far as it can be said that civil causes were legally decided at all in those primitive times. Beneath the court of the shire was the hundred court which had final jurisdiction only in minor cases. Above it was a higher jurisdiction, corresponding in constitution, perhaps, to the King's Court under the earlier Norman kings, but acting apparently only as a court of appeal. These matters are, however, excessively obscure, and the scanty details here given are barely established by a comparison of the few contemporary documents with the institutions of a better known period. But the actual feebleness of all higher jurisdictions may be inferred from the number of persons who had private jurisdictions of their own.

We who live in the nineteenth century, though we may have as much, have no more in common with the men who lived in Britain between the sixth century and the eleventh than an accomplished and humane gentleman has with the rough and cruel and ungovernable boy whose existence may have been continued in his person. We have all been taught, in the nursery, to regard Alfred as a hero, and to set before his name the epithet Great. For the age in which he lived he was truly great—great in comparison with the excessive littleness around him. But nothing could be more unjust to his memory than to judge him by a modern standard, for that would be to compare the inches of an infant with those of a full grown giant. We need not believe all the dubious stories said to have been told by a Welsh monk, the biographer of this king of the West Saxon line—the stories of a monarch turned minstrel and spy in the camp of the enemy, of a warrior turned baker in the hut of a peasant. But we may well believe there was an Alfred who stood, like one of Homer's heroes, a head and shoulders higher than his fellows, an Alfred who had a dim perception that knowledge was better than ignorance, an Alfred who had the good sense to import the literary culture in which his subjects were wanting. Still all the efforts of an Alfred served but to throw a flickering and unenduring light upon the dark deeds which were characteristic of the age, and to which no one individual

General view
of Society in England from the sixth century to the eleventh.

Popular veneration for Alfred "the Great."

could have put an end had he been an Alexander, an Aristotle, or a Justinian instead of an Alfred.

It is a remarkable fact that in the laws which bear the names of Alfred, of Canute, and of Edward the Ferocious spirit in the laws of Alfred, Canute, and the Confessor, as in the laws of an earlier date. Confessor—names more familiar than those of any other kings who ruled in England before the Norman Conquest—the same ferocious spirit is to be observed as in laws of an earlier date, as in the customs attributed to barbarians by the Roman Emperors. In one respect, indeed, a collection of laws attributed to Alfred differs from those of other kings, and perhaps affords an indication of his literary tastes. It is not, like the rest, a repetition, with slight variations, of ancient maxims belonging to Western barbarism, but a selection, from the Old Testament, chiefly of those passages which sanction the demand of an eye for an eye, of a tooth for a tooth, of an exact equivalent for every injury. All such precepts are of course laid down with the simplicity of a school-boy who has with some difficulty mastered the mere letter of the text, and who has no suspicion that the spirit may be somewhat different, or that any allowance is to be made for the hyperbolical expressions of an eastern language. Alfred perceived some sort of resemblance in words between the ancient laws of the Jews and the laws which his predecessors or their councils had drawn up for the people of England. What could be more natural than to add, as he supposed, the authority of Scripture to the penalties which were in those days believed to deter man from crime in proportion to the cruelty with which they were enforced?

If the laws of Alfred were not more merciful than those of his predecessors, the laws of Canute were not more merciful than those of Alfred, nor the laws in force under the Confessor than those of Canute. Alfred may have attempted to reform the manners of his subjects by severities which themselves needed reformation and taught the too easily learnt lesson of cruelty. Canute may have striven for empire, and dreamt of a military supremacy of which the seat should be in London and the power extend beyond the sea, while his subjects in England were to be ruled by the sword, and rendered less dangerous than their wont by employment in war. Edward the Confessor may have believed that the piety shown in neglect of his wife, and the polish shown in the encouragement of French adventurers could aid him in the government of the country; but punishments under him were as brutal as they had been under Ethelbert, king of Kent, or Ine, king of Wessex, or any of the leaders who had brought Teutonic customs across the German Ocean. During the whole period from the coming of the barbarians to the coming of the Normans the chief conditions of life must have been nearly the same. They are most aptly described in the speech which Bede attributes to a pagan chieftain. ‘Our existence,’ he said, ‘seems but a moment in the life of a bird. In the stormy winter-time when the wind is howling, and rain or snow is falling thickly without, but when the hearth within is warm, and the table is spread, a sparrow flutters into the hall. It enters at one door and departs by another. For a moment only it remains in the warm and tranquil air. It flies out of the wintry blast; in the wintry blast again it is lost to sight. Such appears to be the life of man, for we know not what has gone before or what shall follow after.’

Persistence of the same general conditions of life through six centuries.

These words were used as an argument in favour of Christianity, which offered certainty beyond the term of natural life, but they tell a tale of the life itself which suggested the comparison. They tell that the Roman civilisation had been extinguished in the rural districts, that glass had ceased to be applied to the private houses of men who were styled nobles, that there was not even a rough substitute for glass in the depth of winter, and that the chieftain with his followers bivouacked in a rude building—his chief idea of luxury a blazing fire, his chief idea of pleasure an abundance of food and drink. To this condition were the inhabitants of Britain reduced, and in this condition, or one but little better, they remained save, perhaps, here and there in a monastery where some monks had been taught to write and to illuminate, and in the towns which were struggling to revive commerce, and, with commerce, civilisation.

To present the aspects of life in England before the Norman Conquest as a harmonious whole would be to deprive them of their great distinguishing character—want of harmony. Conflict prevailed everywhere—even in principles, if principles could be said to exist. Every man who had power was a law unto himself. Of the towns some were strong and others weak, and that which would be true of one would be false of another. There were state laws, but the state had no power to enforce them, and the great state jurisdiction of the king and his “wise men” could not have given any greater security than that which is to be found in a party struggle. Partisanship the only bond which held men together. Partisanship was in fact the only bond which held men together, the only feeling which prevented the whole population from being a population of Ishmaels, each with his hand against every man, and with every man's hand against him. Jurisdictions and courts have been mentioned in these pages for want of better names ; but it must be remembered that there were practically no courts and no jurisdictions for the decision of matters of fact. The accuser and his party came before a certain assembly ; if the accused had a party sufficiently strong he also appeared and was saved by his friends. Even in the ordeal the theory at least of party and party was maintained. The guild-tie, the family-tie, and the land-tie were, in a sense, all elements of union, but in practice were, still more, elements of discord. Justice in the abstract was an unknown idea ; the only recognised obligation in matters of dispute was to be true to the bond—whichever bond it might be. Family was the enemy of family, guild of guild, domain of domain. Each of these unions possessed a kind of collective freedom, but gave no freedom to its members. Contradiction reigned here, as everywhere else ; and when men united to escape some form of mediæval tyranny they sacrificed the last shred of individual liberty.

The position of the slave with respect to punishments has already been described. This human chattel might be sold at the pleasure of its owner, with the sole restriction that a Christian was not to be The Slave and the Churl. made over to a pagan ; but boat-loads of man-flesh were despatched from the ports of England, and it would be difficult to discover who became the purchasers. The position of the slave, however, was only one degree worse than that of the churl, who always stood in need of some powerful protector, and who could not safely refuse to do that which his lord commanded him. The boundary which divided the free from the unfree was so slight that the churl was always in danger of passing over it. The infliction of a penalty which he could not pay, and which none would pay for him, rendered him utterly bankrupt in freedom. His limbs were not his own to carry him whither he wished to go. If he left the place assigned to him it was held that he had stolen his own body. He could be summarily hanged when caught, and his life was worth nothing to his lord, or even to his kindred, unless they redeemed him. This was the fate which was continually impending over the free man of low estate if he had the misfortune to make enemies among those who had the power to save or condemn him. In such a condition of society he was naturally reckless. In the time of Tacitus the German lover of freedom would stake the precious gift in some game of chance. The custom probably survived in England; and as every man's life had a fixed price his liberty may well have been a negociable commodity. It has often been assumed that had Teutonic institutions never been introduced into Britain we should never have been a free people. As a matter of fact, the Teutonic invaders were at least as well acquainted with slavery as the Romans: they valued independence just as much as the young spendthrift values money when he goes drunk to the gaming table and flings his wealth upon the cloth.

With slavery in its worst form the barbarians, who became masters of Britain after the Roman power was broken, introduced also the custom of wife buying. An unmarried woman was, among them, in the position of a chattel, for the sale of which the owner was entitled to make as good a bargain as possible. It was only natural that in a community in which it was necessary to pay for taking a man's life it should be considered equally necessary to pay for permanent possession of a woman's person. The payment represents, in each case, a rude attempt to super-

The custom of wife
buying.

sedes a primitive condition of universal violence. The two subjects have, however, not been treated together, because, in the one case, the law remained unchanged for many centuries, in the other, the law, if not the practice, appears to have undergone an important modification before the Norman Conquest.

In the laws of the first Christian King of Kent the provisions for the transfer of money or cattle, to be given in exchange for the bride, occupy a prominent place. The principle was carried out with the utmost consistency when the wife proved unfaithful to her owner. Nothing was then considered but the market value of the woman; and the adulterer was compelled to expend the equivalent of her original price in the purchase of a new bride, whom he formally delivered to the injured husband.

The Church was compelled to accept this, with many other discreditable institutions, when it first made converts in England. In the laws of a King of Wessex, who lived at the end of the seventh and beginning of the eighth century, the purchase of wives is deliberately sanctioned; and it is stated in the preface that the compilation was drawn up with the assistance of the Bishop of Winchester and a large assembly of 'God's servants.'

The policy of the Church, however, was to persuade mankind that no civil contract was of any avail to constitute marriage, that the cohabitation of a man and a woman was in itself unholy, and that nothing but a religious bond or sacrament, accompanied by the blessing of a priest, could render it inoffensive in the eyes of God. It was impossible, therefore, that wedding by purchase could long be recognised by religion as a binding contract (even though weddings by purchase might continue to be made) when Christianity was firmly enough established to be above all danger of subversion. The provisions for bride buying accordingly disappear from collections of laws of a later date. The daughter of the free-man seems then to have been allowed, by law at least, some choice before matrimony. She even became capable of holding property in her own right, though the strong arm of husband or kinsman must always have been necessary for its security. The marriage of priests, too, which was at one time very common, must have had considerable influence in changing the national custom, for though the accusations brought against them were innumerable, they were never accused of buying their wives, and could never have performed a public act so inconsistent with their professions. When the monastic party gained a partial ascendancy, and marriages among the secular clergy became less frequent, it was more than ever the interest of the Church to secure the independence of women. Virginity and liberality to religious houses were then extolled as the greatest of womanly virtues; and though it may be doubted whether the persuasion of the priests was always for the benefit of the person persuaded, it cannot be denied that they rendered a service to the country when they taught men that a wife was not to be regarded in precisely the same light as a sheep, or even as a slave.

Its nature.

The Church was at first compelled to accept it.

The Clergy afterwards used their influence to abolish it.

Thus was effected a distinct modification of a most barbarous custom. A great price was paid for it when celibacy was extolled as a virtue; but perhaps no price could be too great for the establishment of the doctrine that the strong have not necessarily the right to enslave the weak ; and the abolition of purchase in marriage was the first step towards that end—the only step, to all appearance, which was made before the Norman Conquest. The change of law was probably not accompanied, at first, by any change of sentiment, or even by a complete change of practice, but rendered a gradual change of sentiment and of custom possible in later times. For this, at least, we have to thank the Christianity of that remote age. But the pagan superstition and the pagan barbarism in which it was imbedded were, in other respects, immoveable.

In theory, of course, the clergy set up a standard of morals which was opposed to most of the worst faults of the age. But the theory was by no means in accordance with the practice. “Peace on earth, ^{Character of the clergy.} good-will towards men” might serve as the text for some of the Ecclesiastical Institutes of the time when there was no peace and but little good-will. A simple industrious life, in which the priest, himself a workman, was to educate his flock, was the ideal which has been handed down in writing. In reality, the priest took to money-getting and wenching, and was frequently rebuked by his superiors for his own ignorance. Priest became the rival of priest for tithes, bishop of king for worldly dignity. The bishop who had begun by washing the feet of the poor and by teaching the gospel in court and council remembered that his life was appraised at regal value, and that he had a seat in the ‘Meeting of the Wise’; but he forgot the rest. Thus even in the eleventh century it is possible to discern the germ of discontent which made Wycliffe popular in the fourteenth, and the orthodox clergy, both secular and regular, unpopular. The continuity of those causes which finally led to the ‘Reformation' receives, as will hereafter be seen, a strange illustration from the History of Crime.

Such was the age immediately preceding the Norman Conquest. To the greed of the savage for flocks or for hunting-grounds had been added the thirst of the trader for wares and for coins; but the townsman had done little, as yet, to soften the manners of the rustic marauder, and force was the ruling principle within the walls not less than without. There were restrictions, and police, and punishments in abundance, watch and ward upon the highways, and watch and ward at the gates. Even to entertain a guest for more than one night in a town was to be responsible for his good conduct. But all these laws served only to show by contrast the lawlessness, violence, and recklessness of the people. Life continued to be bought and sold; property was secure only to him who had the power to hold it. A permanently settled government, which, whatever may be its form, is the truest friend to civilisation and the greatest enemy to crime, was a blessing of which the idea was as yet hardly conceivable. The curse of the barbarian conquest still weighed heavily on the land; and when Lanfranc, an Italian monk accustomed to the manners of Norman nobles and Norman clergy, became Archbishop of Canterbury, he was appalled by the manners and customs of his flock. To him a war between lord and lord, between town and town, could not, after his experience of life, have appeared an extraordinary event. To him it might have seemed wrong, but not strange, that a bishop should assert territorial or even spiritual rights by violence. To him slavery was not an unknown nor, perhaps, even an indefensible institution. But beyond all this there were features in the English life of his time which almost drove him to despair. To be the Primate, and to be the friend of the Conqueror seemed to him no compensation for the necessity of living in a country so uncivilised as England ; and he addressed the Pope, in no hesitating language, with a request to be relieved from the intolerable responsibilities of his position. Let me, he said, retire again to a monastery ; better that than be the religious ruler over these godless tribes of barbarians.

Description of the inhabitants of England by Lanfranc.

CHAPTER II.

FROM THE NORMAN CONQUEST TO THE THIRD CRUSADE : ENGLAND AT THE END OF THE TWELFTH CENTURY.

IN an age when chivalry was almost a synonym for brutality, the relations of the Normans to the Englishry led inevitably to acts of cruelty on the part of the victors and of treacherous assassination on the part of the vanquished. The actors, indeed, in the events which were immediately consequent on the battle fought near Hastings had neither the will nor the power to give accurate descriptions of the scenes before their eyes. The weaker minds were stunned ; the more active became blindly vindictive. Even the native annalists who lived at the beginning of the following century were still dazed by the shock of a battle no longer recent. With a strange mixture of resignation and spite, they magnified the extent of the disaster and attributed it to the will of God. He, they said, accomplished in the year 1066 a design which He had long conceived, and delivered over the English race to be exterminated by the merciless and crafty Normans. That mediæval tone of thought, according to which a thunderstorm was a miracle, and a fever was caused by witchcraft, naturally enough represented a successful invasion and a change of system as the annihilation of a people by fire and sword.

First effects of the Conquest.

The continuity of our history from the time which preceded the Conquest to later ages has, however, long been made clearly manifest by the industry and skill of eminent lawyers and scholars. Nor is it ^{Continuity of History.} less easily to be traced in the crimes of either period than in the uncouth terms for which the Normans could find no French or Latin equivalent. The mass of the population hated its Norman as it had previously hated its Danish rulers, but it was in no sense altered in character. The degradation of a new foreign yoke was, indeed, added for a time to all the evil influences which had long retarded the growth of civilisation ; but England was neither better nor worse in moral tone at the end of the eleventh century than she had been in the middle of the tenth. A change, most beneficial to later generations, was effected indirectly by the army of William the Norman, but it was a change so slowly brought about and so little perceived during the time of its progress that there need be little wonder if the English regarded the establishment of a new dynasty as a misfortune beyond redemption, and vaguely clamoured long afterwards for the Laws of the Confessor.

For many a year the insolence of the oppressor and the hatred of the oppressed produced their natural fruits, which are independent of race, or climate, or even of civilisation. It would, however, be most unfair to hold the Conqueror or his successors responsible for the brutal punishments inflicted during their reigns. Mutilation in every form had long been the recognised penalty for trivial offences. William the First and William the Second, perhaps, availed themselves of it to preserve their forests in a manner unknown to their predecessors ; but it was in itself as familiar to the English as any institution which they possessed. The first object of the Conqueror was without doubt the security of himself and of his followers ; but he was hardly less anxious to provide for the good government of his realm in the only sense in which it could be understood in that semi-barbarous age. He rigorously enforced the responsibility of the hundred, in order to prevent the loss of French lives at the hands of English assassins ; and the English themselves were not allowed to enjoy the same protection against murder. But the assassination of the Danes under similar circumstances may, perhaps, serve as some justification for this severity ; and in other respects the English seem to have been gainers by the systematic repression of crime to which they had never been accustomed. They confessed with astonishment, in the year 1087, that murder had become comparatively rare, and that a traveller had been known to arrive at the end of his journey without having lost his money.

If deeds of violence and robberies had diminished at this time, it would be difficult to exaggerate the lawlessness of earlier years. It must have been not The Normans and the Englishry. long afterwards that Lanfranc wrote to Robert de Limesey, then styled Bishop of Chester, in terms which show the scant respect entertained even by the clergy of those days for authority and for property.

‘I sent you, not many days ago,’ says Lanfranc, ‘a letter, which, as I am informed, you barely read before you threw it from you in a passion. I now send you another, on the part of the king and of myself. I command you to put an end to those grievances which it is said you are inflicting on the monastery of Coventry, and to restore, without delay, what you have carried off from it by force. The abbot and monks have complained to me that you entered their dormitory by violence, broke open their chests, and seized all the goods which they possessed. You pulled down their buildings and ordered the materials to be conveyed away for use in your own diocese.' Lanfranc concludes with a rebuke, of which the practical value may be estimated from the fact that this very Robert de Limesey continued to be a bishop all the days of his life, and removed his see from Chester to Coventry, the scene of his former exploit, where he was buried with the honours due to a great and good man. Such deeds, so easily condoned, may receive some explanation from the contempt with which a foreign bishop, perhaps, regarded native abbots and monks. But the spirit of the age still proclaims itself, after all allowance has been made for the special circumstances.

If, however, rude Normans believed themselves to be not only the conquerors, but also the superiors, intellectually and morally, of the conquered, there can be no doubt that they had some justification in facts. The practice of exporting slaves had never been abandoned in England, and William, much to his credit, sternly repressed it. There is some reason also to believe that the improvement in the marriage laws which had been gradually effected by the influence of the Church had been inoperative upon the masses of the populace. Even after the Conquest, a letter from Pope Gregory VII. to Lanfranc, contains evidence that the barbarous custom introduced by the settlers from Northern Germany still continued to exist. He had heard, he said, that, in Scotland, men commonly deserted their wives, and sold them too; and he desired the Archbishop to forbid such wickedness, both there and elsewhere 'in the Island of the English.' It may be inferred from his description that the old practice had not yet become obsolete, that it was still possible, though, perhaps, not legally, to purchase a bride, and that if she proved unfaithful, the seducer was still compelled, probably by threats or by violence, to make restitution in the shape of another woman bought at the same price.

It is, too, but justice towards the Italian appointed by William, as the successor of the native archbishop, to acknowledge that he aimed at the estab-Humanity of Lanfranc. ment of a far less brutal rule than that which contented the Norman knights. If the king, or his council, enunciated the principle that malefactors so debased as those of England should not suffer death—only because it was better that they should, as cripples, serve for a warning to the ill-disposed—it is not less true that, in the synod held at London under Lanfranc in 1075, the assembled bishops and abbots expressed their disapprobation of the maxim. It is true that there were, in later times, bishops who had no more humanity than savages, but it is not less true that gentleness and mercy were, as far as he had the power, introduced into England by Lanfranc.

The amiable character of this Italian priest stands out in strong relief not only against the brutal manners Lanfranc, and the scenes around him. of his native flock but also against the somewhat less brutal manners of the king and his followers. The Normans added the trial by combat to the other barbarous methods of deciding matters of fact already existing in our island. To them the duel seemed the fairest and most chivalrous way of settling all disputes; and it may be admitted that the duel conducted on certain established conditions, in the presence of spectators, was not inferior to the similar recognition of the blood-feud, to the practice of composition, to the ordeal, or to compurgation. But the whole course of Lanfranc's life, and the whole tenour of his letters show what weariness of spirit he endured when he reflected on the scenes around him. He was unfortunate, so far as his own happiness was concerned, in being the most liberal, and probably the most learned, prelate of his age. He stands almost alone in the great waste of mediæval bigotry as a bishop who possessed at once erudition, discretion, genius, and charity. He may be regarded as the impersonation of the good effects which were ultimately consequent upon the Norman Conquest. He was one of the first leaders in the great literary revival, in which the most acute intellects were led on from the study of the poets and historians of Rome to the study of the philosophers of Greece. The stream of Greek thought thus poured into Christian minds, created, as is well known, a new school of Christian metaphysics, which, though it did not itself produce great results, was of great service in the development of European intellect. One of the first of those thinkers who attempted to strengthen religious doctrines by scholastic arguments was Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury. It was a happy augury for future ages, that he was distinguished from those who surrounded him not less by moral worth than by mental energy. The dawn of learning was attended by the morning star of that mercy which is often the truest justice. Both, indeed, were obscured almost as soon as they appeared; but in the end, increasing obedience to improving laws kept pace with the growth and diffusion of knowledge.

Though the progress of learning, and with it the diminution of crime, must in any case have been slow, it was retarded in England by the rigour with which the prelates, under the new dynasty, insisted upon the celibacy of the clergy. In the eyes of Lanfranc a priest's wife was a living evidence of barbarism, no less than ignorance of the Latin language; and thus he could not attempt to improve the minds without offence to the sentiments of English ecclesiastics. To them it seemed that he offered metaphysics as a substitute for matrimony, but not that they would profit by the change. They would have been willing to accept instruction as a gift, but the price demanded was far too high. They thought it better for a man to be illiterate and the father of a family than learned and a monk. One of Lanfranc's earliest letters to Rome contains a complaint that there existed, both among the laity and among the secular clergy, a feeling strongly adverse to the monastic life; and he related, with horror, that the Bishop of Lichfield had not only a wife but children, and made no attempt to conceal his iniquity. The Pope's legates excommunicated this incontinent Englishman, who was at last persuaded to end his days in a monastery. Thus the Church took away with one hand while it gave with the other, and added a new element of hostility between conquerors and conquered.

It was not, perhaps, only a coincidence that the Conquest was effected at a very critical period in the history of the Church. The time at which it is commonly said that England became feudal was the time at which the Church attempted to make all earthly kings the feudal vassals of the Pope. It was not without ulterior designs that Alexander sent to William the consecrated banner which encouraged the French adventurers on the field near Hastings. The change which the papal court hoped to effect in the tenure of thrones was far greater than any effected by the Conqueror in the tenure of lands. The churls were dependents on military chiefs before the Norman set foot on the soil; they would afterwards have found difficulty in showing any real difference in their condition. The new superiors spoke a strange tongue and perhaps called their domains by a strange name; but the manor had long existed, in fact if not in word, and its lord continued to be called lord in the vernacular speech whatever the title which he had adopted himself. It will hereafter be seen that the traditions of the earlier time were handed down to reigns long subsequent to the Conquest, and account for much of the lawlessness which prevailed. It is, therefore, unnecessary to discuss the effects of that great revolution upon the theoretical position either of the land-holder or of his subordinates. Regarded from another point of view, the feudalism introduced by the Conqueror differed from the feudalism previously existing in England by its superior organisation and completeness. This had a beneficial effect, in a manner which will be explained in another page, but not simply because it was feudalism. So far as the mere relation of inferior tenant to superior lord is concerned, the effort made at the same time by the Church to usurp the supreme power is of more importance in the History of Crime and of its punishments.

Gregory VII., who succeeded Alexander as Pope, assumed over the Conqueror, as over other monarchs, the authority of a superior lord. He perceived that the organisation of the feudal system must inevitably thwart the ambition of his order

Separation of ecclesiastical and secular jurisdictions.

unless the Church could adapt that very organisation to her own purposes. Bishops and abbots already did homage, and swore fealty to kings, before they could enjoy their lands ; but if kings could have been brought to swear fealty to the Pope the relative positions of Church and State would have been reversed, and there would have been but a single ruler, at once spiritual and temporal, of Christendom. William, like all but the very weakest of his successors, firmly resisted the attempted encroachment, and declined to recognise the Pope as his superior lord, on the ground not only that he had never promised any such submission, but also that none of his predecessors had sworn fealty to the predecessors of Gregory. Though, however, the Court of Rome did not attain complete success, it did, even in the reign of the Conqueror, make a great advance towards the end which it had in view. The ecclesiastical jurisdiction was at this time formally divided from the civil by charter. The line of demarcation, it is true, was never very clearly defined ; but the mere fact that courts Christian were thus established was regarded by the ambitious clergy as a proof of growing power and independence, and gave a sort of colour to the appeals, and other recognitions of Roman authority, which for many generations embarrassed our kings. Closely connected, too, with this distinction of courts spiritual from courts secular was the strange feature in our criminal jurisprudence, subsequently known as Benefit of Clergy.

The exemption, however, of ecclesiastics from secular jurisdiction, never quite complete in England, had not its origin in the reign of the Conqueror. His regulations had for their object the discrimination of offences, and the increase of ecclesiastical authority over offenders of a particular kind. But it had long been usual for men in orders, when accused of any crime, to assert the right of clearing themselves in a manner different from that prescribed for laymen; and the priest, when reduced to the necessity of escaping by compurgation, had fellow-priests for his fellow-swearers. Thus much was firmly established when the Danes were masters of England, and probably as soon as Christianity was itself firmly established in the country. The ancient immunity developed into benefit of clergy, as the barbarous customs which preceded the Conquest developed or were changed into legal processes; and there can be little doubt that the extension of clerical power about this time gave new strength to the privileges which the clergy had previously enjoyed. In this way an anomaly, which had sprung up in the rudest times, gained force enough to survive through ages of a very different complexion, and expired almost recently when everything was changed except itself.

Growth of the Privilege of Clergy.

Among the more direct consequences, not of the feudal system, but of the Conquest itself, was the erection of fortresses in every part of England. The Normans—superior to the subject race in Religious and Military ferment throughout Europe. mechanical knowledge as in military skill—naturally protected themselves by strongholds, which would be impregnable in the eyes of any native chief, while no native chief would have so secure a place of refuge in case of need. These castles exceeded, both in magnitude and in solidity of construction, all similar buildings with which that generation of Englishmen was acquainted. They had, as was intended, the effect of overawing the rebellious spirits of the neighbourhood in which they were planted; they had also other effects, not perhaps foreseen, but of considerable importance in the history of our manners and customs. If they exalted the baron they also depressed the burgher; if they gave strength to that military discipline which is in some degree a check upon criminals they also weakened those forces to which towns give nourishment, and which have a far wider and more important operation upon crime by diminishing the tendency to commit it. Military ardour received a new impulse from the success of the Norman invasion and of the policy by which its results were rendered permanent. At the same time the flame was fanned by the feudal aspirations of the Church, eager that all Christian kings should rank as captains fighting under her banner. There was nothing of which men could speak or think but wars and rumours of wars, from the Irish Sea to the walls of Jerusalem. Not only Britain but the whole of Europe was in a state of change, from which it would have been impossible for the wisest to predict the issue. It is, indeed, at first sight, a marvel that England escaped as soon, and on as easy terms as she did, from the fires that blazed upon and around her; and, before describing the many long centuries of misery which the circumstances of the Norman invasion and the antecedent causes rendered inevitable, it is necessary to dwell a little more in detail upon the advantages directly attending the Conquest.

Even in the reign of the Conqueror himself it is possible to discern the beginnings of order, of system, of unification in matters of finance, and as a necessary consequence in matters of law. Before this time it does not appear that there was any central authority which could demand an account in writing from subordinates at a distance. Domesday

Book is at any rate the earliest of the returns to writs issuing from the king or his court in England. The idea of making this compilation has of course been attributed to Alfred just as the absence of thieves and the safety of gold and silver hung upon hedge-rows have been attributed to his reign in works written for children, or chronicles forged by monks. But the conception of one England held in a firm grasp under a single king was hardly possible to Alfred—much less a scheme, such as that which was carried into execution by the Conqueror, for showing the value and tenure of all the lands in the country.

In the plan according to which Domesday was put together lies the nucleus of the plan according to which justice was administered in subsequent reigns. Local functionaries and local testimony were subordinated to that higher power which, if not in this reign, was subsequently known as the King's Court. As the first of the Public Records relates chiefly to finance, though it incidentally illustrates various other matters, so the second (if mere charters be excepted) belongs to that department of the original King's Court, which was soon afterwards called the Exchequer. This roll which was written at the end of the reign of Henry I. is hardly less precious than Domesday itself, as showing the continuance and progress of the policy by which an attempt was made to consolidate the kingdom and to give it what it had never possessed before the Conquest—uniformity in its fiscal system, in its laws, and in the method of administering them. The revenue was then to a considerable extent dependent upon the fines paid by hundreds, for offences committed within their limits, as well as by individuals. The criminal jurisdictions which

The King's Court; the Exchequer;
Fines for Crimes.

were not private had therefore an intimate connexion with that branch of the central authority which had to deal with receipt and expenditure. In the Great Roll, as it was called, the accounts of the sheriffs of the various counties were entered, and, among them, the profits to the Crown from legal proceedings. From the time of Henry II. downwards, the Great Rolls were made up year by year and preserved in the Exchequer. Before this time only the one Great Roll of the thirty-first year of Henry I. exists. But whether this is or is not the first of a once continuous series, it is, with its successors, a great monument of the new notions of order and responsibility for which we are indebted to the Norman dynasty.

In this Roll, too, are some indications of the system of eyres or circuits definitely established in the reign of Henry II. It is apparent that the old custom still survived, and that the local magnates were judges in their own districts not only in the ancient shire-moots but also in the courts introduced by the Norman kings. Yet it is also apparent that in the latter they had the assistance of men possessing some little pretensions to legal training. One at least of those who hold the pleas travels over no less than twelve counties. The names of others appear in as many as six counties; and though in some cases it is not difficult to perceive that the possession of land has conferred the judicial qualification, the beginnings of a most salutary change are sufficiently manifest. National life, national organisation existed as yet only in idea; they cannot be brought into existence by an edict; the earliest efforts to foster them must of necessity be only rude experiments. But the first crude conception of a plan with those results for its object marks the starting-point of a new era. The unity of the realm is the leading principle in the scheme of the Conqueror and of Henry the worthiest of his sons ; and the principle is not restricted to the barren regions of abstract speculation, but displays itself in such action as was possible to the limited intelligence of the period.

First indications of the Eyre or Circuit.

It is difficult, under the trammels of our modern language, and in the midst of our modern civilisation, to describe the difference between the successive stages of mediæval society. That which is but an incipient glimmer through the darkness, if it is not passed over in silence, is apt from the force of contrast to appear as a glare of strong light. The promise of improvement which showed itself in the reign of Henry I., was only a promise of improvement upon the disorganisation and barbarism of the age which preceded the Conquest. It was followed by disorganisation and barbarism of a similar character during the civil wars between Stephen and the Empress. It re-appeared under Henry II., but it long remained a promise with little fulfilment, and was thwarted again and again by the persistence of those influences which came into operation upon the fall of the Roman empire.

To deny that Henry I. or his advisers had better ideas of government than any which existed in England under the West Saxon dynasty would be to ignore all the scanty evidences of either period. To suppose that any approach towards good government in the modern sense was then possible would be to misapprehend the whole character of the times. Rough distinctions between what was crime and what was not crime, rough punishments, rough and even tyrannical methods of enforcing them throughout the kingdom might be described as the ideal of perfection to which the best even of the Norman monarchs aspired. William the Red was a tyrant, unredeemed by any higher aims than the secure enjoyment of his rough tyranny. Henry I. was a tyrant hardly less rough, but endowed with a certain rugged sense of justice. He would not have hacked and chopped the limbs of his subjects for mere sport; but still less would he have been deterred by any sense of pity from hacking and chopping any low-born transgressor of the law.

Attempts to effect improvements continually thwarted.

Good government in the modern sense impossible.

Crimes in those days, and for many a generation afterwards, were committed wholesale. When anarchy was not superior to monarchy, punishments Henry I. and the Coiners. were necessarily wholesale also, and brutal to boot. Apart from mere crimes of violence which were so common and so essential a characteristic of the age that no attempt can be made to estimate their number, the offence which comes into greatest prominence is that of false coining. So imperfect was every rude attempt at commerce that, even in the reign of the Conqueror, live stock might legally be offered in payment instead of money. Before the reign of Henry I. the coinage had been so little developed that the silver denarius or penny was commonly broken into halves or fourths when the sum due involved fractions of the whole coin; and this, it should be remembered, was at a time when the purchasing power of the piece of silver must have been far in excess of that possessed by our modern shilling. Moneyers were, as they had been before the Conquest, numerous, but their art had so fallen into decay with the Roman Empire that money was scarce. The population, not familiar with the current coinage as we are, were easily deceived by spurious metal or light weight. Henry I. attempted to provide a remedy for some of these evils by coining round half-pence and by increasing the severity of the laws relating to the mint. Under the kings of the West Saxon dynasty the loss of the right hand had been the common sentence against the coiners of false money who appear to have been generally the authorised moneyers of the various towns. Henry detected the same class offending in the same manner and, without introducing any cruelty unknown to the ancient constitution, applied to their transgression a penalty formerly restricted to offences of a different nature. The chief moneyers throughout the whole of England were convicted of making pence in which there was base metal illegally alloyed with the silver. By the king's command they were all brought to Winchester, and there suffered in one day the loss of their right hands and of their manhood.

The stern and pitiless rule, of which this punishment is a fair example was probably the best which it was possible either for king or for subjects to conceive in England at the beginning of the twelfth century. The choice lay between that and anarchy in a greater or less degree, with the not uncommon accompaniment of a civil war. The reign of Henry I. presents a somewhat greater contrast to that of his successor than it would have presented had Stephen possessed a better title to the throne. But the dispute concerning the succession gave no more than free play to the pent-up brutality of all classes, which centuries of gradual progress alone could soften. From the time when the Romans abandoned the island, there had never been internal peace of any long duration ; lawlessness, if partially hidden for a few years, was always ready to burst forth when any temporary restraint was in the least degree weakened. The very claim of Stephen was, in itself, an indication that government according to established law, on the one hand, and obedience to established law, on the other, were not the recognised principles of action. Even the order of inheritance had not yet been settled: and when the son of the Conqueror's daughter asserted his title, the daughter of the Conqueror's son could prove her title preferable only by a resort to arms. The question which had been undecided before the Conquest—whether a brother should inherit in preference to a son—was undecided still; and the more complicated question which arose when Matilda and Stephen asserted each a right to succeed could be set at rest in only one way.

Anarchy during Stephen's reign ; private mints.

The disruption of the kingdom, which was the consequence of the inevitable civil war, was rendered more disastrous by the castle-building tastes of the Norman knights. Neither claimant of the crown was strong enough to refuse a licence to fortify if asked, or perhaps even to insist upon the right of granting it. Every noble who had the means built a castle; every holder of a castle was a petty sovereign; each of these petty sovereigns proved himself a tyrant. Bishops and counts and barons usurped the royal authority; each of them set up a mint of his own. Thus in a few years all the good effected under Henry I. was turned to evil. The punishment inflicted on the false moneyers lost all its terrors when every local magnate became a false moneyer for his own purposes. The improvements in the law, of which there was fair promise in the first of the Great Rolls, were checked, and for the time, almost forgotten when the kingdom was divided against itself and there was no central authority to dictate harmony in the administration. Records, without which justice is a mockery, ceased to be written, or were destroyed ; the king's court sat no longer ; men forgot even to solemnise the principal festivals. The chiefs among the clergy and laity alike forswore themselves again and again, as their interests inclined them, and carried their followers from side to side as opportunity offered. Government, indeed, no longer existed, and there was no security for life or property but the will of a capricious lord, or the mercy of a merciless man at arms.

Such anarchy as this, continued partly from the love of independence, which was the heritage of lords and barons both of English and of Norman blood, had almost its only antidote in the policy which had become traditional in the family of the Conqueror. The unification of the kingdom, by making the central authority visible throughout its length and breadth, was an object of which the monarchs given to us by France never lost sight ; and, though they may have had selfish ends in view, the effect upon the laws was in the end none the less beneficial. When the articles of peace were drawn up between Stephen and Matilda's son Henry, both contracting parties were equally anxious to secure effectually the interests of the crown, which were at that time almost identical with the interests of the people. Unless the sense of the treaty has been very much perverted by the mediæval chroniclers, it might have been taken as the expression of a most earnest desire on both sides to save the country from bloodshed, oppression, extortion, and injustice of every kind. Even the popular superstitions were treated with deference, and a prophecy said to have been uttered by Merlin, the enchanter, was carefully explained, in such a way that no disaster might be apprehended from its supposed fulfilment in the compromise between Stephen and Henry. Good laws, prosperity, and peace within the realm, if not without, were to follow this happy agreement. In the expression of all these good intentions there was some sincerity, but there was also a strong desire that loss of power by the Conqueror's family should not be the consequence of the family quarrel. Much was promised to the classes which suffered most when most the great barons could overawe the crown; but the crown had every prospect of being more blessed in giving than the subjects in receiving.

Unification of the kingdom the traditional policy of the Conqueror's family.

The class which in the end profited most by the troubles of Stephen's reign was the clergy. The interests of ecclesiastics as feudal nobles were, in some respects, identical with those of the barons : but the clergy also constituted a party with interests of its own. As always happens when there are many parties in the state, that which holds together most firmly is best able to carry its point by taking advantage of weaknesses in the others. Thus, though in grasping at privileges for themselves, the clergy sometimes incidentally secured a new liberty for the people, it was impossible for them to look with favour on the policy by which the Norman kings wished to consolidate the kingdom. Their hostility to it was less apparent on the surface than that of the lay nobles, but was at bottom even more dangerous. That uniformity in the administration of the law which was beginning to be regarded as the outward and visible sign of the royal authority was never the end and aim of a spiritual lord, even though he might hold the office of Chief Justiciary. While the object of the sovereign was always unity, the object of the bishops was duality.

This policy was distasteful to the clergy.

When they acted most faithfully as ministers, they were still more faithful to their order; and, for that reason, when justice became something more than a mere name, it was clogged with the strange encumbrance called Benefit of Clergy.

The power acquired and exercised by the clergy during the troubled reign of Stephen led almost inevitably to quarrels between the King and the Church. Most conspicuous, from the crime which followed it, was the quarrel between Henry II. and Thomas à Becket. The clerical dignitaries were eager to uphold their dignity; the royal authority was not yet secure. The law was so unsettled that insolence on one side or tyranny on the other might be speciously represented as a desire to do right. Henry had not been many years on the throne when an Archbishop of Canterbury of his own selection opened the campaign against him on behalf of the Church. The story is differently told by different narrators, according to their prejudices or their different sources of information. There is, however, no doubt that Becket wished to carry out one leading idea, which it is easy to discern in the most contradictory accounts. Wherever the Church was concerned, or ecclesiastics asserted that it was concerned, in respect either of property claimed or of persons accused, there, according to his view, the ecclesiastical courts alone had jurisdiction.

The quarrel of Becket with Henry II.; the rival jurisdictions.

The cases first brought into dispute were apparently certain ecclesiastical claims to land and advowsons; but the chronology of the chroniclers is somewhat confused, and as the records of the period do not supply what is wanting, it is vain to look for a perfectly accurate version. It may suffice, however, to state that in these matters the archbishop asserted a final right of appeal to Rome as well as the primary jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in England, and that the king denied one no less than the other.

About the same time a similar battle was fought on another field. Some members of the ecclesiastical body had been accused of various offences, including rape and murder. A canon, too, had spoken ill of the king's Justiciary. Sentence of degradation had been passed in courts Christian, but, as the king believed, no sentence proportionate to the crimes. He therefore wished that clerical criminals should be punished by secular judgment. But this, the archbishop maintained, would be contrary alike to precedent and to the canon law. The king and his party maintained that, whether contrary to the canon law or not, it was in accordance with precedent. The royalists probably had in their minds the fact that the Church had not enjoyed the advantage of an actual division of jurisdiction before the Conquest, nor, perhaps, during part of the reign of Henry I. The clergy could have pointed, with no less justice, to the custom according to which the clearance of accused persons belonging to their order had long been effected by compurgation, and according to which, in the most ancient times, the compurgators were not laymen. Here, as elsewhere, the law was in a state of transition, or, to speak more correctly, principles of law were but just coming into existence. It was impossible to give clear definitions when the first rude attempts were being made to evolve order out of a chaos: and had consciences been more tender than they were in that age, either the king or the archbishop might safely have declared that if they erred they erred in ignorance.

The ill-feeling engendered between the king and the archbishop increased from day to day, and could not be allayed by any apparent reconciliation. As in many similar cases, the most terrible effects ^{Murder of Becket.} were in the end brought about by the most trivial causes acting upon minds already irritated and ready to disregard all the dictates of reason. Henry II., sensible of the insecurity of all order in his realm, determined to associate his eldest son with him in the sovereignty. The younger Henry was solemnly crowned, but not by Becket, who, as Archbishop of Canterbury, claimed the right to officiate. In consequence of this slight the primate obtained from the Pope letters of excommunication against certain bishops who had been present at the ceremony. In spite of an apparent renewal of friendship, this last act seems to have rankled more deeply in the king's breast than all the archbishop's previous arrogance. He allowed, in a moment of anger, certain expressions to escape him, which were construed by some members of his household into a desire that Becket should no longer exist to trouble him. They quitted the king's court in Normandy, sailed by stealth for England, met at Saltwood, the seat of one of Becket's greatest enemies, and there deliberately matured their designs.

It was but a few days after Christmas Day when four knights unceremoniously entered the primate's chamber, and seated themselves unbidden in his presence. They had, they said, a very simple request to make—absolution for the excommunicated prelates. Becket raised some technical objection—and it probably was not in his power to do that which was asked precisely as the knights asked it. They were retiring in a manner which caused him to enquire whether they intended to threaten him in his own house, and for answer they said only that they would do more than threaten. The fact, however, that they went out seems to indicate that they had entertained some hope of gaining their request by intimidation, and that they had not yet finally decided upon the deed which followed.

In those days few men had faint hearts for crime. To consult in hot blood after such a refusal as they had met, and with their recollection of the king's words in their minds, was to take the worst resolve. They soon returned, but found that the primate was now in the Church, at vespers. They gave him his choice—either to absolve the bishops or to die. His answer did not satisfy them, and they laid hands upon him to drag him out of the Church. He clung with all his strength to a pillar, and it became difficult to remove him without bloodshed. To one who was more persistent than the rest he applied the epithet 'Pimp.' This was the signal for a blow. His head was injured, though an attendant suffered in attempting to save him. The knights struck him again and again on the crown till it was severed and he fell, a corpse, before the altar. One of their ruffian attendants who, it is said, had taken orders, gloated over the deed in a manner which was only too consonant with the tone of the age, and was permitted by these noble companions of the king to pick out the brains of the victim with his sword, and to spread them, in grim triumph, over the pavement of the cathedral.

With the action of the king and of the Pope in consequence of this atrocious deed the present history has no concern. The crime itself has been described as an apt illustration of the acts which were possible in those times, and of which the 'chivalry' of England was capable. It will be seen that the knights or 'chivalers' of later times were little more merciful, little more refined. The only marvel is that in the reign of Henry II. there were any intellects sufficiently advanced to perceive the need of great reforms, and to design, however roughly, plans of legal improvement. In this respect the advantages of the Norman Conquest were beginning to show themselves; and had Henry's immediate successors possessed his genius, or been fortunate enough to discover advisers as skilful as his, they might, perhaps, have hastened by a little—by a very little—the progress of English civilisation. The quarrels with the archbishop and with the Pope do not appear to have had the effect of retarding the legislation upon which the king had resolved; and he persevered consistently in the course which he had marked out for himself as most likely to lead to the complete consolidation of his kingdom. It was not in his power to see the whole of the obstacles in his way; nor could men in those days discover the gradual operation of causes through long periods of time. To devise a present remedy for a present evil was the most that could be expected of the most enlightened lawyers; it was not given to them to discern the causes of present evils in past ages of brutality, or to attempt a mitigation of crime by a mitigation of ferocity in the law. Nothing that the king's advisers could have contrived would have effected a great and immediate change in the manners and moral tone of the people; but all that it was possible for men to do in such an age they did.

Exactly a century after the battle near Hastings, a judicial system was promulgated in the 'Assise of Clarendon.' In this document occurs the first mention of a body which, so far as criminal matters are concerned, can be directly compared with the juries of modern times.

Origin of the Grand Jury.

This and the Laws of the Conqueror afford the connecting links between the fellow-swearers of old and the jurors of to-day. According to the Assise, enquiry was to be made respecting murder, robbery, and theft, by means of the oaths of twelve lawful (free and not outlawed) men of every hundred, and four lawful men of every vill, in every county in the realm. Anyone whom they charged before the Justices or before the Sheriffs, either as principal or as accessory, was to be apprehended and tried by the ordeal of water. The nearest approach to this scheme which can be discovered in any reign before the Conquest is to be found in the 'Laws of King Ethelred,' which, in the clause now under consideration, certainly refer only to the northern part of the realm. It is there provided that in every wapentake the reeve and the twelve elder or superior thanes shall swear to accuse none who are innocent, and to conceal none who are guilty. But the mention of the reeve is sufficient to prove that the institution, whatever it may have been, was of a more permanent character than a mere jury.

It is, however, by no means improbable that the old custom of the northern wapentake may have contributed one of the elements to the constitution of the jury on which the whole nation has been accustomed to pride itself. A combination of some attributes possessed by the reeve and thanes with some attributes possessed by the fellow-swearers on the side of persons accused or on the side of individual accusers will give, in a rudimentary form, nearly all the characteristics of the grand jury. The fellow-swearers were brought together, as required, to take oath upon one particular charge. The same reeve and thanes, on the contrary, 'presented' charges of unlimited number from time to time, and probably during a whole year at least. If the element of permanence be taken from them, they are hardly distinguishable from the ordinary supporters of the prosecution ; if the fellow-swearers have the element of permanence added to them, they are hardly distinguishable in function, though they may differ in rank, from the reeve and thanes. The latter, too, had every inducement to exculpate natives of their own hundred, though it was legally their duty to send suspected persons to trial. They have, therefore, a resemblance to the swearers on either side. The modern petty jury is as temporary in its nature as the ancient band of fellow-swearers. The modern grand jury is neither so temporary as the ancient band of fellow-swearers, nor has it, like the reeve and thanes, any of the permanence of a court. Like the latter, it presents a number of charges for subsequent trial ; but, like the former, it dissolves, never to meet again, as soon as the objects for which it is summoned have been attained.

The intimate connection of the grand jury, as it developed itself after the Assise of Clarendon, with the ancient fellow-swearers and with the reeve and thanes, may also be inferred from a passage in the Laws of the Conqueror, which would be absolutely unintelligible if there were no explanation in the previous and subsequent writings. It is provided that a person accused in the hundred by four, is to clear himself by the 'hand of twelve.' Hand upon holy things were the twelve thanes to place when they swore ; hand upon holy things was the rule whenever oath was made. As the twelve in the one case were to swear that they would truly present for trial those who by common report were criminals, so the twelve in the other case were to swear that a particular charge was falsely made against a particular person. Twelve, it is to be observed, is a number which, before the Conquest, appears only as an exception, and in the northern shires. Immediately after the Conquest it is the favourite number in the selection of bodies which have to give a verdict of any kind. As both Normandy and the north of England had been conquered by Scandinavian chiefs, it is by no means improbable that some old Norse or Danish superstition lurks under the modern preference of the number twelve for a jury. Twelve and multiples and fractions of twelve are, of course, treated with favour in laws of Germanic origin on the continent; but the number twelve is certainly by no means prominent in our own earlier laws, and as certainly comes into prominence in the reign of William I. In the most important of all matters—the compilation of the laws in existence under his predecessors, which his new subjects called the Laws of the Confessor—it was decided by him and his council that the work should be accomplished by twelve men in each county, sworn to omit nothing, to add nothing, and to change nothing.

The Assise of Clarendon was recast, and in some matters extended, ten years later, by the Assise of Northampton, which supplies another connecting link between the ancient reeve and thanes mentioned in the 'Laws of King Ethelred,' and the compurgators mentioned in the Laws of the Conqueror. At Northampton it was provided that the twelve men of the hundred were to be, if possible, knights; but that twelve other free and lawful men would suffice. The knights correspond most clearly with the elder or superior thanes ; the other free men are only such as might have been ordinary fellow-swearers to clear a particular person under William I. The reeve and thanes, reappearing as knights, have lost the character of a permanently constituted body ; free men of the lower class, who, in the wager of law, might still act as mere fellow-swearers for a particular occasion, are permitted also to participate in the higher functions of those who make a general report upon the crimes of the district.

The change which was gradually effected by the growth of juries receives also some illustration from the later history of compurgation as applied to laymen. The old practice, under a new name, survived, half-hidden, in its original shape, long after its blood-relations had almost ceased to resemble it. Compurgation and the Wager of Law. The Wager of Law, as it was called after the Conquest, to distinguish it from the Wager of Battle, was not formally abolished by statute till the reign of William IV. This, as is well known, was long a recognised mode of procedure in civil cases though the extent to which it was in use can only be established by reference to unpublished records. Centuries after the Conquest it was the custom in some manors for those who were accused of such petty trespasses as killing a neighbour's sheep or pigs to declare themselves innocent and offer the wager of law. Their exculpation was still, as before, by a certain number of 'hands,' and twelve, in the north at least, reappears as the number most favoured. Such as was provided for the hundred in the Laws of the Conqueror was the rule of law for some manors even after the invention of printing. Common repute in the district was in all cases the nearest ancient approach to the modern testimony of witnesses, and the modern verdicts of juries. Between the courts of the manor and the courts of the hundred, there is, indeed, no real distinction, and from the customs observed in them, there can be little doubt, has been developed the whole system of trial by jury. But both the grand jury and the petty jury differ alike from the court of thanes and from the fellow-swearers, and have assumed features peculiar to themselves of which, in the case of the petty jury, even the rudiments are hardly discernible in the features of their ancestors. The wager of law, buried among the rolls of manor courts is like those fossil species of animals but recently extinct, which, as naturalists tell us, show the descent of creatures still before our eyes and point the moral that modifications of organisation are necessary when the conditions under which we live have themselves become modified.

The jury-system was, however, during the reign of Henry II., beginning to develop itself in various directions. The Grand Assise for the settlement of disputes respecting land is described by Glanville as a boon accorded by the king to the people on the advice of the nobles. The lawyer contrasts it with the duel, for which it was the alternative, in somewhat extravagant terms of laudation. He draws a picture of a trial by battle in such a way that it seems to possess some features more like those of the unreformed Court of Chancery than those of the primitive resort to force. The parties could not appear in person, but were compelled to send each a champion to maintain his cause. Before the actual combat was begun there might be innumerable delays caused by excuses on either side. The poor man's substance was eaten up while he

Development of the jury-system under Henry II. ;
the Grand
Assise.

was waiting for a decision ; and Glanville admits, as an educated man could hardly fail to admit, that the issue was not always in accordance with justice. With a regard for human life which few except himself possessed in that age, he regrets that in this legal encounter one man must either be slain, or bear the name of "recreant;" and to be a craven was to be dead in the eyes of all who could distinguish between manhood and the want of it. Each champion he regards as a single juror sworn to maintain the truth, and insists that the testimony of a greater number must necessarily have greater weight.

In the constitution of the grand assise, as well as in the fact that it was looked upon as a concession, there is an indication that its origin must be traced to native institutions. The old appeal to common repute, the old mention of the shire and of the neighbourhood, even the old family tie are impressed more or less clearly upon the grand assise. Four lawful knights of the county and of the neighbourhood, chosen by the sheriff or, perhaps, by his county court, are to elect twelve other lawful knights of the same neighbourhood, who are to declare upon oath which of the litigants has the better right to the land in dispute. If, perchance, none of those first nominated have any knowledge of the matter, they are to make oath in court to that effect, and others are to be brought in until some are found who are acquainted with the facts. If some have knowledge and others not, those who are ignorant are to be excluded and substitutes are to be summoned until the number of twelve at least is made up. Should some declare for one party, and the rest for the other, more must again be called in until at least twelve are unanimous on one side or the other. All must swear that they will not knowingly declare what is false or conceal what is true ; and nothing is held to be within their knowledge for which they have not the evidence of their own eye-sight, or their own hearing, or the words of their own fathers, or words which they feel bound to consider as trustworthy as their own.

Enthusiasm for such legal machinery as this will raise a smile on the face of a modern lawyer. The jury or Partisanship and Perjuries of Jurors. recognitors, though they have the final decision in their hands, are in one sense witnesses, and in another judges ; but they are also counsel and attorneys in the cause which they decide. They practically have the power to collect evidence outside the court and to give it effect by their judgment inside. There is no check upon them except their oath to tell the truth, and no check whatever upon those from whom they may have obtained information. The jurors themselves, indeed, were punished, if they were found guilty of perjury or if they confessed it, by forfeiture of goods, by imprisonment for not less than a year, and by the infamy of incapacity to make oath again in any court. But the prospect of conviction had little terror for a jurymen who had sworn falsely. The old spirit of partisanship had lost little or none of its strength, and even Edward I. was unable to eradicate it though his laws most vigorously denounced it. The guild or the neighbours would hang together, and the danger of conviction would be not for him who had sworn falsely in concert with his comrades, but for him, if any such could be found, who had sworn truly but had not been supported. The threat, nevertheless, of prosecution for perjury is an important addition to the institution of the grand assise—perhaps even more important than the assise itself. It recognises far more distinctly than had previously been recognised, the distinction between truth and falsehood, and is a step towards breaking down the superstition that whatever is stated upon oath must necessarily be accepted as true. This is an advance towards the later plan of listening to evidence on both sides and giving a judgment after comparison. But it was not until the evidence, which the jurors of the grand assise could acquire for themselves in the district, was brought into court, and there sifted, and until jurors were forbidden to consider facts within their own previous experience that there existed, even for civil causes, a true jury in the modern sense.

A connecting link between the jury of the grand assise and the later jury for the trial of criminals is to be found in the jury summoned to decide whether a Christian had died in the crime of usury. This offence, it seems, could not yet be made the subject of a direct accusation. But if it was commonly reported that any one had practised usury there followed upon his death an inquest to ascertain whether he had repented and abandoned the practice during his life. If not, his goods and chattels were forfeited to the king and his lands to the lord of whom he held—as in cases of felony. The question was decided by twelve lawful men of the neighbourhood, who, like the twelve knights in the grand assise, made oath concerning the facts of the case, and possessed complete control over the possible inheritance of the usurer's representatives. Here, as elsewhere, partisanship must have determined the issue; and usury was regarded with such superstitious horror that all who were suspected of profiting by it must have left their families almost destitute of friends. In this method, however, of trying a

Link between
the Grand Assise and the later jury in criminal cases.

suspected person when his body was in the grave, may, in spite of its injustice and its defects, be discerned a step towards the jury of the coroner and the jury of the criminal court. The advance was just as great as that made by the grand assise in civil cases, but no greater. In both there are indications of an attempt to ascertain truth by evidence, but they are so slender that they might pass unnoticed if they were not seen by the light of later history.

The complicated scheme for the selection of the jurors to form the grand assise was, probably, drawn up with the object, long unattainable, of checking the prevalent tendency to swear in favour of persons rather than in accordance with facts.

Attempts to counteract the evils of partisanship.

The interposition of the four knights between the sheriff, to whom the king's writ was directed, and the twelve who were to decide the cause, there can be little doubt, was a device to counteract the partiality of the chief administrative officer in the county. A very similar piece of legal machinery came into operation elsewhere, in the reign of Richard I., or perhaps before. The twelve jurors of each hundred, who had to make their presentments to the Justices concerning its crimes, according to the Assises of Clarendon and Northampton, were afterwards chosen on a plan obviously imitated from the form of civil procedure which had been extolled by Glanville. In the first place, there were to be selected, probably by the sheriff, possibly in full county-court, four knights out of the county at large. These four were to select two lawful knights out of each hundred or wapentake, who were in turn to select ten more knights or lawful freemen, and so to make up the jury of twelve. Here, perhaps, may be seen another attempt to apply a filter, and a vain hope that partiality might be left behind in one of the many layers of men through which justice was made to pass.

Conspicuous above all things in these legal reforms, of which the idea belongs to the reign of Henry II., is the growing uniformity of procedure. The level attained is by no means high, but all ^{Attempts to secure uniformity of procedure.} parts of the kingdom are brought up to the same height; and in the application of similar processes to civil and criminal cases is to be discerned the germ of an important principle, which was in the end developed into our modern system of determining matters of fact by evidence given before jurors in court. It is from this period that the growth of trial by jury can be historically traced; it was after this period that were effected the important distinctions between grand jury and petty jury, and between jurors and witnesses. There is, indeed, some temptation to trace the descent of the petty jury from the band of compurgators, and of the grand jury from the reeve and thanes—to find for each only one parent in a single institution; but the legal formalities existing at the end of the twelfth century forbid the acceptance of so simple a pedigree for either. The old customs, indeed, survived the Conquest; but they were barren till French or Italian lawyers and ecclesiastics settled the terms of their union, married them in a fashion previously unknown, and taught their offspring to tread in new paths. The English juries of modern times—a somewhat numerous progeny—are all descended from a common ancestry, and, though their walks in life are different, are all partakers in a family likeness.

The Assises of Clarendon and Northampton, however, are remarkable for other most important articles besides those which relate to the primitive jury. So far as the criminal law is concerned these two documents differ little, except in the greater severity shown in the latter, which was drawn up after the suppression of a troublesome rebellion. The general scope of both was to provide for the apprehension of criminals, for their safe custody before trial, and for their punishment when found guilty. But the difficulties which impeded the execution of this design are painfully obvious in every detail. In the first place it appears that some of the counties possessed no gaol or prisoner's cage. The deficiency was to be made good at the king's expense, and, if possible, out of the king's wood. It may easily be imagined how much the brigands of the time were impressed by the authority of the law, when they had long been accustomed to roam over whole shires in which they could not be imprisoned by the king's officers. These cages were to be constructed within the king's castles, or fortified towns, and were, probably, designed with a view not less to the prisoner's discomfort than to his safe-keeping. The sheriffs had authority to apprehend suspected persons, and to enter the liberties of those who enjoyed private jurisdictions in order to discharge their duties. But if they attempted to act upon their instructions it was by no means improbable that they would be insulted and violently expelled. The king's writ was thrown in the face of its bearer long afterwards; and a clause in the Assise of Clarendon shows that the privileges of local magnates had been upheld against the royal power long before. The law was good, but to make a law is one thing, to enforce it another; and that which was difficult to the first three Edwards must have been impossible to the first three Henries. The mode of trial was to be what it had been before the Conquest, with the difference that compurgation was no longer permitted in those cases which were of sufficient importance to be brought before the Justices in Eyre. Compurgation, indeed, would have been inconsistent with the action of the twelve men who presented the accused for trial, and who would, under the ancient system, have been fellow-swearers, either on the side of the accuser or on the side of the accused. Ordeal, therefore, stood to the twelve men of the hundred in the relation in which the petty jury afterwards stood to the grand jury. It finally decided the facts of the case. He whose innocence was denied by the hot water, in a case of murder, robbery, arson, or offence against the coinage, lost a foot, and after the Assise of Northampton, a hand in addition. He was also compelled to abjure the realm; and, by a strange provision, even those who were acquitted by the ordeal were also banished, if they were of ill fame. This, perhaps, another faint indication of an attempt to weigh evidence, and to act upon it.

General design of the Assise of Clarendon, the Assise of Northampton, and the Inquest of Sheriffs.

The ancient system of Peace-Pledge was fully recognised in these Assises. The sheriffs were directed also to register the names of all those who fled from their own counties so that they might be sought throughout the whole realm. As in the age before the Conquest, no stranger was to remain more than one night in a town, unless his host would be responsible for him. Finally, all the inhabitants of England were strictly forbidden to give either lodging or sustenance to any unfortunate person who had been branded on the forehead as a heretic; and any house which had been polluted by the presence of one of the renegades was to be carried beyond the walls and burnt. In those cruel times, perhaps, the last inhuman clauses were but a natural corollary of the early institutions which had survived the change of dynasty.

Conspicuous above all other provisions in these laws is that Norman policy of unification which was dear to all the Conqueror's successors. The subordination of the sheriffs, in their judicial capacity, to the higher judicial authority, is made apparent in many of the articles. In one, the duties of the sheriffs upon receipt of a summons from the travelling justices, are expressly regulated, and it is fully apparent that the intention was to reduce the local potentates from the position of independent judges to that of officers carrying the law into execution under the direction of the King's Court, as represented in the Eyres. In the interval between the time when the Assise of Clarendon was drawn up, and the time when it was confirmed and extended by the Assise of Northampton, a severe blow was dealt against the territorial magnates by means of an 'Inquest of Sheriffs.' In the majority of the counties new sheriffs were appointed, and this was no slight change at a time when their office did not ordinarily terminate with the year. Those who were displaced, and all who had held the shrievalty, since the king's last voyage to Normandy, had to find sureties for their appearance in the King's Court to answer for their past conduct. The 'Inquest' also affected those barons who administered justice either in their own franchises or in the royal demesne, and was, without doubt, intended to serve the double purpose of strengthening the royal power, and of allaying the bitter complaints which were now, and for many centuries afterwards, raised against all the ministers of the law. The contemporary authors from whom it is possible to gain some knowledge of the actual state of society, show only too clearly, that the general dissatisfaction was by no means ill-founded, and that if the Inquest of Sheriffs did not greatly improve the moral tone of the kingdom, it was, at least, justified, and demanded by the existence of wide-spread corruption.

The reign of Henry II. is a historical stand-point from which the past and the future may be conveniently surveyed and compared. The local and private jurisdictions which had grown up after the fall ^{Improved legal education.} of the Roman empire were yielding slowly and sullenly to the institutions which men who had studied the Roman civil law believed to be better alike for king and people. It was not, indeed, because a copy of Justinian's Pandects had been discovered at Amalfi in 1130, that new ideas had travelled to England, and that Oxford had begun to instruct her pupils in the legal lore of a civilised people. The Roman traditions had never been entirely lost on the continent, and they could not fail to produce their effect upon our island when the Norman rule brought it under the influence of French lawyers and Italian ecclesiastics. The civil law, however, was not yet applied in practice, for it could not easily be harmonised with the feudal tenure of land, or with the native methods of trying and punishing criminals; and commercial contracts had not yet assumed sufficient importance to demand a special mode of procedure. But it was no small gain to the country when a school of law was established, and when men trained by the study of the Roman jurist began to deal with the hideous conglomeration of inconsistencies, which, under the name of local customs, had survived the Norman Conquest.

The subject people, always petitioning for the Laws of the Confessor, were not unnaturally opposed to any innovation. They understood perfectly well that a visit of the Justices was attended by fines which were, in many cases, unjust, and were engines of extortion; they could not understand that out of the plans put in operation by Henry II. there would one day be developed a system of justice under which impartiality would be a matter of course, and under which not a Judge upon the Bench could even be suspected of corruption. To them a new tribunal seemed only a new torment; the reason was not that the new tribunal was not better than the old, but that the old had been so bad as to appear worse than none. The robbers and outlaws, a very numerous class, were averse to any institutions which might render robbery more difficult; the barons, accustomed to hold little king's courts of their own, had no wish to see their power swallowed up by the greater King's Court at Westminster, which was putting forth suckers in all directions; the under-tenants, not too well content with the exactions of their superior lords, perceived in the eyres only a device for making them subject to two masters instead of one—for flaying them after they had already been shorn. In those days it does not seem to have occurred to any one that he could individually be the better for law and order firmly established throughout the country. The old legal formula by which jurisdiction was conferred, was incomplete without the word 'tol'; and with toll the idea of jurisdiction had become inseparably associated. To be left to himself, to take what he could, and to hold what he had, as best he might, by his own strong arm, or by the aid of his friends, was still the Englishman's ideal of life.

General
aversion to changes in the law.

For the past he had all the stolid reverence of ignorance ; for any attempted change he had no feeling except suspicion ; for reforms designed by a foreign dynasty he had but one epithet, 'outlandish' ; and that was sufficient to stamp them as prejudicial to his interests. The re-introduction of civilisation was thus beset with almost insuperable difficulties. The best devised measures, if they effected a benefit in one direction, could not fail to do harm in another. The law-giving class, while improving its own intellect, was rousing the evil passions of those whom it was attempting to govern. Those for whom a blessing was intended obstinately regarded the blessing as a curse. The barbarism of the past was considered an inheritance to be carefully preserved ; and he who attempted to remove it seemed, in the eyes of the English, to be a Jacob attempting to deprive them of their birth-right.

It is only the persistence of this habit of thought, fostered by almost ineradicable traditions, which can explain the anomalies of later times. It was not simply because Henry III. was a feeble king that he had to limit the visits of the travelling justices for the trial of criminals to one in seven years ; it is easy enough to perceive that they were equally unpopular in the time of his grandfather Henry II., whose force of character was insufficient even to carry out the eyres as intended after the Assise of Northampton. The Great Rolls of the Exchequer, if studied with a little patience, show how very different were these early eyres from our modern circuits, and how feeble the institution was in its early growth. An eyre, indeed, followed immediately upon the legislative decisions of Northampton, when it may be assumed that the king's appetite for judicial reform was strongest. But even at this favourable stage, it was two years before the justices travelled the country again with full powers; and at the end of the reign of Henry II., the interval between eyre and eyre had already become nearly, if not quite, three years. If in the next two reigns the judicial visitations for holding pleas of land became more frequent, judicial visitations for investigating crime did not become more popular. Thus local obstructiveness held its ground against central authority, until it gained its great, though temporary, victory over the King's Justices, and excluded them from every county for seven years at a time.

Opposition to
the eyres.

The meaning of this persistent hostility to the authority of the crown in the higher criminal jurisdiction was that the perpetration of crime in any degree was not, according to the popular opinion of the time, an evil so much to be dreaded as the extortion of a judge. Its effect was that the greater the crime, the greater was the probability of the criminal's escape. Minor offences, such as larceny, fell under the cognisance of the Sheriff, whose courts were held at reasonable intervals throughout the year. Cases of homicide, and all other Pleas of the Crown were reserved for the king's Justices, the time of whose circuits was uncertain, and commonly so remote as to have little terror for the evil-doer. But it must be remembered that these rare visits of Justices trained in the king's court were instituted as a remedy for still greater laxity in the administration of the law, and that if the murderer commonly escaped after the Assise of Northampton, he had still more commonly escaped before. From the fact that an eyre set in motion not more than once in two years was regarded, on the one hand, as a powerful engine for the repression of crime, and,

Meaning and effect of this hostility.

on the other, as an un-English attack upon the liberty of the subject, may be inferred the state of society which the king or his advisers wished to supersede; and the inference will be strictly in accordance with the sketch which an attempt was made to draw in the first chapter of this history. It will hereafter be seen that subsequent legislation and subsequent records point to precisely the same conclusion, and that the barbarism introduced by the Teutonic invaders of the Roman empire possessed a vitality which only the operation of antagonistic causes through many generations could thoroughly soften.

In the meantime, the retarding effect of that subjection to a foreigner, which must have been felt with bitterness during the reign of Henry II., and long afterwards, should not be forgotten. It is true that an eminent official of the Exchequer is said to have compiled a work concerning that department, from one passage of which it might be supposed that the distinction between English subject and French ruler had disappeared at the end of the reign of Henry II., except among the rustics of the lowest grade. But the author of this treatise—whose name, and the time of whose existence are only matters of inference—must, if he really lived at the period assigned to him, have been extraordinarily ignorant of the legal proceedings and of the records with which he should have been familiar. Nothing is more apparent in the Great Rolls of the Exchequer and in the records of the King's Court than the rigorous observance of that distinction between Englishman and Frenchman which had been sternly drawn in the laws of the Conqueror. The hundred has still to pay for the murder of a Frenchman, is still excused when the person murdered is an Englishman, still

Position of the Englishry in the rural districts.

bears the humiliation conveyed in the principle that whoever cannot be shown to be English shall be considered in the eye of the law as worthy as though he could be shown to be French. Nor has the Conqueror's law degenerated into a mere form, according to which the hundred is liable for the violent deaths of those who cannot be identified, or for the omission of the hue and cry. The Englishry is, like the Jewry, still a term of contempt; the life of the Englishman is of less value than the life of a Jew. Not only has the hundred to make its 'presentment of Englishry,' when the name of the Englishman secretly slain is known, not only is it fined when the parentage of the dead is unknown, or for concealing the death altogether, but sometimes it is detected in falsifying the facts, and incurs an additional penalty for declaring that a murdered Frenchman was an Englishman. The law-book compiled by Bracton in the reign of Henry III. shows that the old institution was still in force, and that the first point for the hundred to establish in a case of murder—or slaying without witnesses—was, whether the person murdered was English or not. Though the reign of Edward I. was one conspicuous above all others for legal reforms and for improvements which affected the whole legal system, the presentment of Englishry still survived, and was not abolished till it had indeed grown out of date in the reign of Edward III.—a full century and a half after the time now under consideration. To a courtier, indeed, who knew that the royal blood of England was already compounded of the blood of the West Saxon kings, and the blood of the Norman dukes, it may have seemed that the difference between conqueror and conquered was effaced; it was, no doubt a common topic of conversation that if descendants of those who had held land under Edward the Confessor held the same land under Henry II., the intermediate generations had been prudent in their marriages ; and it was obvious that English birth was no longer an insuperable obstacle to promotion in the Church. But the recognition of no class except the king, the clergy, and the great landholders on the one hand, and the serfs on the other, is, in itself, an indication of the subjection in which the bulk of the English people was held. The division of classes was, perhaps, still as nearly as possible what it had been before the Conquest, but the serf had exchanged a master speaking his own language for one who was very commonly ignorant of it. The small freeholders had certain rights according to law, but, when viewed from so great a height as the Exchequer, they seemed indistinguishable in the great mass of English humanity, to which the official gave the common name of villeins.

The position of the rural population naturally suggests an inquiry concerning the condition of the towns during the first century after the Conquest. As, however, they had not yet come into marked prominence it will be convenient to defer the
The towns not yet able to exert their influence for good.
consideration of their growth, and of their influence upon crime, to another chapter. In this place it is only necessary to remark that they were beginning to receive charters, which seem to have had two distinct effects—one good the other evil. It was, in the end, most beneficial to the country that they acquired power, and exercised their power in a direction opposed to the barbarism which had long retarded their increase. But the early mode of acquisition was, in accordance with the prejudices of the time, adverse to those improvements which the king's advisers wished to introduce into the administration of justice. The ancient practice of compurgation had no place in the Assise of Clarendon; and the intention obviously was to abolish it throughout the realm, and to give uniformity to the criminal mode of procedure in every county. One of the privileges, however, which the towns-men were most anxious to secure, and most successful in securing, was that of independent jurisdiction, or, as it was commonly expressed in their own charters, that they should not be compelled to plead outside. It is thus apparent that the dread of the judge, and of his extortions, was as deeply-seated in the towns as in the country—that the word 'justice' had become a by-word for that which all were anxious to avoid. Thus while the towns-men were, unconsciously perhaps, laying the foundations of a far higher civilisation, they were, unconsciously also, propping up those remains of barbarous customs which were the greatest obstacles to progress of every kind. They were supporting the principles of private jurisdiction and compurgation—the one the great obstacle to the existence of a strong and united England—the other the very essence of opposition to that free and fair inquiry, without which all intellectual advancement is impossible. Yet for this mistake, which they could not have avoided, they made at last a splendid compensation, by converting their petty individual independence into national liberty, and the barbarism which had been forced on them by successive conquerors into widespread order, security, and refinement.

The purpose, however, of the legislation which has been described, and the task which remained to be performed in the future, cannot be fully understood without the aid of a more comprehensive sketch of the general state of society than has yet been given. The actual amount of crime, and its proportion to the population, at the end of the twelfth century, cannot indeed be stated with any accuracy, but materials are not wanting for a description of the manners and customs, and of the general tone of thought, which prevailed in England.

The universal want of respect for human life is shown in all the chronicles of the period. In London, where Jews were frequently massacred by hundreds, the streets were, after sunset, given up to rapine and murder. That which would now be called crime became the favourite pastime of the principal citizens, who would sally forth by night, in bands of a hundred or more, for an attack upon the houses of their neighbours. They killed, without mercy, every man who came in their way, and vied with each other in brutality. On one occasion a band of these distinguished murderers and burglars marched to the house of a merchant. It was strongly built of stone, but the assailants were well provided with the implements of house-breakers, and forced a passage through the solid masonry with their iron wedges. They supposed that they could then easily satisfy their thirst for plunder and blood. But the occupant of the house had been forewarned of the attack, had collected his servants, and had invited his friends to aid him. The leader of the robbers, who was known as Andrew Bucquinte, was, perhaps, related to a sheriff of London who bore the same name. Bucquinte advanced with a lighted torch and with a brasier full of burning coals ; but while an attempt was being made to increase the light, by the aid of some candles which the practised robbers had had the forethought to bring with them, the master of the house suddenly sprang out from his place of concealment. Bucquinte attempted to stab him, but he wore a cuirass, which resisted the blow, and in another moment he had struck off Bucquinte's right hand with his sword. The rest of the band, surprised at the resistance, fled and left their leader a prisoner. In return for this desertion, and to save his own life, Bucquinte betrayed his accomplices. Among them was one John Senex, or John the Elder, who was known as one of the richest and most influential men in London. He was tried by the water-ordeal, but failed to clear himself. He then offered five hundred marks to the king for a pardon, which was refused, either because the sum was too small, or because the scandal was too great; and he was hanged like thieves of a lower grade.

It might be almost safely assumed, without evidence, that, when the chief merchants of London were in the habit of practising burglary and murder, the inferior traders were not scrupulously honest. There is, however, no necessity to rely upon conjectures when contemporary documents afford sufficient proof of the fact. False weights, false measures, and false pretences of all kinds were the instruments of commerce most generally in use. No buyer could trust the word of a seller, and there was hardly any class in which a man might not with reason suspect that his neighbour intended to rob, or even to murder him.

The morals of the court were no better than the morals of the shop. There was no subject in which the best writers of the period took a greater delight than in the vices of the court of Henry II. Walter Mapes Archdeacon of Oxford, himself a courtier and wit, has described, with sarcasm but with evident enjoyment, the scenes of which he was a witness. He would not, he said, undertake to prove that the court was hell, but he had no fear of contradiction when he stated that the court bore as great a resemblance to hell as a mare's shoe bears to a horse's. Hell had been described as a place of torment, but there were no torments imagined by the ancient poets which were not realised in the court. If Tantalus was doomed to thirst for waters which flowed before his eyes, but which he could never taste, the courtiers were always thirsting for their neighbour's goods, which were always eluding their grasp. If Sisypheus was condemned to roll a huge stone up the side of a steep mountain, and to see it always bounding away from him when he reached the summit, the courtiers were always falling back into the valley of avarice as soon as they had scaled the mountain of wealth. If Ixion was bound to a wheel destined to revolve for ever, the courtiers also were bound to the wheel of fortune; and no day passed in which they were not alternately elated by some worthless success or depressed by some ridiculous mishap.

The Court as described by an Archdeacon.

As there were birds of ill omen and of prey in the infernal regions described by the classical writers, so, said Mapes, there were birds of ill omen and of prey in the court. These were the Justices, the Sheriffs, the Under-sheriffs, and the Bedels, Venality of Justices, Sheriffs, and other courtiers. whose eyes were everywhere, and who were always careful to punish the innocent. The acceptance of bribes was the great sin of these officials, in whose behalf the Archdeacon quotes the saying of Ovid, that 'giving is a proof of good sense.' Mapes confesses that the clergy were not more merciful or more just than the laymen, and relates a story of an abbot who became a justice, and who exceeded all his colleagues in extortion because he hoped to buy a bishopric with the spoil. The avarice of men in authority, and the eagerness of place-hunters, became a favourite theme of invective. The Foresters, especially, whose duty it was to discover and punish all offences committed upon the king's hunting-grounds were held in the utmost detestation. The subordinates of the king's chief officers were so numerous, and bore such a character, that they were compared to swarms of locusts which devoured everything in their course, and which if by chance they left a single leaf untouched left it only to be devoured by succeeding swarms.

The chief qualification for success at court was the power of making and appreciating mirth. The mental gifts which earned for our country the name of 'Merrie England,' and which afterwards displayed themselves in the writings and sayings of humorists and play-wrights were not without cultivation at the end of the twelfth century. The royal favour might be earned by a pun or a witty retort almost as certainly as by service in the field—far more certainly than by upright and honourable conduct. The courtiers who wished to distinguish themselves in the king's presence made collections of amusing stories. Geoffrey of Monmouth, the founder of historical romance, had recently died, and had bequeathed to posterity a rich mine which poets have not even yet exhausted. The deeds of Arthur and his British knights became familiar to all the frequenters of the royal palace; but Geoffrey's tales alone could not suffice for the great and ever increasing demand for amusement. The camp in the Holy Land, and the city of Rome became the two great marts for the interchange of social wealth; every traveller and every Crusader added new anecdotes to those which were already in circulation; and every country began to learn the favourite tales of its neighbours.

The infidelities of women were commonly the narrator's theme, and an exhortation to avoid matrimony was the most common form of advice given by a man to his friend. War and intrigue were regarded as the two principal amusements in life, the acquisition of wealth the only object worth serious consideration. A consequence of this creed was that the husband frequently set a price upon his wife's virtue, and made a profit of his own dishonour. Fathers were ready to sell their daughters, and excused the iniquitous traffic on the ground that the end would be the same whether they received the money or not. The unnatural procurers avenged themselves by seducing the wives and daughters of their acquaintances and employers; they studied every art by which a mean advantage might be gained, and thought themselves most fortunate when they could fawn themselves into an office which gave them opportunities of extortion and oppression.

When the courtiers grew weary of the minstrel's songs and the jongleur's pranks, when they were not occupied in making love or discharging the office of pander, they beguiled the lagging Loaded dice. moments by the dice, and by gaming in every form then known. Before the third Crusade there was in England no check upon the vice and no limit to the stakes. The gamester who, when young, had been defrauded of his patrimony, preyed in turn upon unsuspecting youth. He lived upon the weaknesses of human nature, watched with pleasure the trembling fingers and flushed cheeks of his victims, led them on by apparent carelessness to risk a larger sum after losing a smaller, and left them only when they could no longer call even their clothes their own. The dupes often discovered, when it was too late, that they had never had a chance of winning, but had been ruined by the dishonesty of their adversary. They then began to practise the arts of deception for their own advantage, lured their friends into the snare in which they had themselves been caught, and made themselves independent of fortune by loading the dice.

It was from such courtiers as these that Henry was compelled to select the officers whose duty it was to carry out his legal reforms. His own court was the greatest impediment to his own best designs, for the more scrupulous a man was, the more difficult he must have found all access to the king. Henry made various experiments, seeking, now among the laymen now among the clergy nearest to him, for that honesty which he never made remunerative. But he could neither discover nor create an honest Justice. Driven almost to despair by the condition of his kingdom, he selected, in 1179, the Bishops of Winchester, Ely, and Norwich to be his Chief Justices, in the hope that they might check the iniquities of their subordinates. But if it was the function of the courtier bishops to see that the law was impartially administered, they must have been somewhat slow in learning their duty, for the whole country continued to suffer from the abuses against which their learning and purity were considered a safeguard. The whole clerical body, indeed, if they grew no worse, could certainly not have grown better between this time and the end of the century. Even the amorous Richard I. was astonished at the profligacy of the men

Character of the Clergy according to contemporaries.

whom he expected to set an example to his subjects. It was the custom of the secular clergy, he said, to spend the alms extracted from the laity not upon the poor, for whom they were intended, but in vice and debauchery, to pass their days in guzzling and drinking, and to deck their mistresses in gay attire, while they gave no thought to their own vestments or the books of their church. All this he could have endured, had they not carried their lust into the homes of the laymen, and added adultery to their other offences. He did not even know where to choose a bishop or an archdeacon whose character befitted a preacher of God's Word.

In such sweeping denunciations as this there is, of course, some exaggeration. The art of telling the simple truth was not cultivated in the age of chivalry; but the simple truth was that, though the social condition of England gave better reason for hope than at any time since the Romans had quitted the island, it was, according to modern ideas, almost incredibly depraved. There is difficulty in realising a state of society in which one archdeacon considers it a good joke to trace the resemblance between the infernal regions and a court consisting in great part of ecclesiastics, and in which another archdeacon devotes energies and abilities by no means contemptible to scurrilous attacks upon his superiors, and afterwards descends to the most abject supplications. Peter of Blois, Archdeacon of London, had no hesitation in describing a certain prelate as a monster of iniquity. This bishop, he said, hated honest men, took the prudent by surprise, lured the unwary into his toils, robbed the rich, oppressed the poor, never did a good action, and was a nuisance to all mankind. He would never listen to what others had to say; he would only consider what others had to give. He had no pity for the afflicted and no indignation against the cruel or unjust. He regarded every event as a pretext for the extortion of money by fair means or by foul. • He made his demands with a shameless face ; he felt no gratitude to those who gave, he showed no mercy to those who refused. There was no human tie which could bind him, no appeal which could move him, no hope of his improvement. Hated by all who knew him, he was himself a hater of law and order, a despiser of good faith, a breaker of his word, slothful in action, and furious in anger. At table he rendered himself disgusting by his gluttony, his drunkenness, and his filthy language. He had no moderation in prosperity, and no courage in adversity. He cared nothing for the sanctity of his office, and had lost all capacity for friendship, all regard for honesty, and all sense of decency.

It will be seen, from this specimen, that the language of the most cultivated writers of the period was as violent as the spirit of the times, for the letters of Peter of Blois do not, except perhaps in superior literary skill, differ in character from those of his contemporaries. Nor indeed was it only in words that the clergy conformed to the manners of their age. Like their predecessors of earlier days, they would resort to main force when they saw no other means of attaining an end. Thus, it had long been maintained by the Archbishops of York, that an Archbishop of Canterbury could never justly claim the Primacy of all England by virtue of his see, but only by virtue of his prior consecration when he happened to have been consecrated before the existing Archbishop of York. When Thomas à Becket was succeeded by Richard, Prior of Dover,

The Clergy of the two provinces exchange blows at Westminster.

Roger the Archbishop of York became the senior Metropolitan, and asserted his claim to the Primacy. Richard strenuously opposed his rival. A council was summoned by the Papal Legate, to meet at Westminster. The usual seat of the Primate was on the legate's right hand, and the Archbishop who could occupy that position would exhibit himself to the assembled ecclesiastics as the head of the English Church, while the Archbishop who failed to secure it would appear to have yielded to his rival. Roger, being the weaker of the two disputants, was the first to appear in the council-chamber, and lost no time in seating himself in the place of honour. Richard, when he entered, refused to take any seat but that which was occupied by Roger. Loud and angry words were followed by blows, and a hand-to-hand fight ensued between the clergy of the two provinces. Numbers in the end prevailed, and Canterbury proved itself superior to York in physical prowess. Roger was ignominiously dragged from the chair which he had appropriated, and was trampled in the dust by his victorious enemies. Pointing to his tattered robes, he asked redress of the Cardinal-Legate, who dissolved the council, and announced that the dispute must be decided at Rome. It does not, however, appear that the Pope expressed any displeasure at this tumult, or that either of the Archbishops lost any of that respect which he had previously won.

When the two chief ecclesiastical dignitaries of the realm were not ashamed to engage in a furious brawl, it may well be believed that the inferior clergy were not on all occasions respecters of the law. Their ambition, combined perhaps with their superstition, led them into some remarkable crimes, which it is difficult to narrate with becoming gravity. The miracles

Value of
relics.

which were supposed to be wrought by the bodies or by any relics of saints invested the burial places of holy men with extraordinary sanctity. Not only did Henry II. make pilgrimages to the tomb of the murdered and sainted Becket, but Louis VII. of France crossed the Channel to beg the intercession of Saint Thomas of Canterbury in favour of his afflicted son. Fortunate, indeed, was the monastery or the church which possessed any wonder-working remains, and strange the means by which they were obtained. So great was the value set upon them that, like the wealth of this world, they tempted men to be dishonest.

In the Abbey of Bodmin rested the bones of Saint Petroc, the virtues of which, it may be supposed, had grown famous in the dialects of Brittany and Cornwall. Martin, one of the canons of Bodmin, was persuaded to escape from the house, to carry off with him the remains of the Saint, and to bestow them upon an Abbey in Brittany. He succeeded perfectly in his design; the Breton monks received the treasure with exultation, and without remorse for the theft of which they rendered themselves the accomplices. The Prior of Bodmin, as soon as he discovered the loss which he and his brethren had sustained, presented himself to the king, and related his misfortune. Henry promised his aid, and directed a letter to the Justice of Brittany, in which authority was given to enforce the restitution of Saint Petroc's body. The justice placed himself at the head of his retainers, and rode to the doors of the Breton abbey. The abbot and monks were at first obstinate in their refusal to give up their ill-gotten prize; but the justice warned them, with an oath, that unless they delivered it to him without further delay, he would take it by force, as the king had

Stealing of Relics sanctioned by a Religious House.

bidden him. This argument at last prevailed, and the justice received from them, as he supposed, the remains of the saint. When, however, the Prior of Bodmin received again the object of his monastery's veneration and pride, he was seized with a horrible suspicion that his dishonest enemies were still defrauding him, and that they had substituted another and less holy body for the body of Saint Petroc. Nor could he be satisfied that the remains had been really restored in their integrity until the Breton abbot and monks had confirmed their protestations by an oath taken on the relics of their own house. He must have had a remarkable faith in the power of such things to give honesty and veracity to thieves.

The possession of holy relics, however, was but one of the many sources of wealth enjoyed by the religious houses. The monasteries derived immense revenues from lands which supported the dignity and contributed to the pleasure of the Abbot or the Prior. They furnished, perhaps, an entertainment for the king The Clergy and the Poor. when he travelled through his realm, and their doors were not always closed against more humble wayfarers. But they were not, as might be supposed, so many fountain-heads of charity devoting their riches to the relief of the poor. The clergy did, without doubt, distribute alms, but they first received the alms, not in the shape of rents from their own manors, but in the shape of gifts, certainly from the Royal Exchequer, and probably also from private individuals. It is in no sense true that the burden of supporting those who could not support themselves was first thrown on the laity or on the State when the monasteries were dissolved. Even as early as the time of Henry II. provision out of the royal income was made for the sick in all the chief cities and in many of the smaller towns. Persons who were disabled by blindness or by other permanent infirmity received special grants. The task of distribution was naturally enough entrusted to those members of the clerical body who preferred a life of active charity to the excitement of the court or the useless misery of an anchorite's cell. Many of the religious houses also received, year after year, sums of money for which they alleged some special need. The payments, however, to monasteries, by virtue of the king's writ, are rare in comparison with remissions of payments due from the monasteries to the Crown. It is difficult to conceive, when all these advantages are borne in mind, that the disbursements of abbeyes or priories, under the head of public duties, could have exceeded their receipts in one form or other from the king's sheriffs. Almost all the alms either to religious houses or to the sick became established as annual payments and were deducted in each county from the total sum due to the Treasury; the temporary exemptions also were soon established in like manner by a kind of prescription, though they were not officially classed under the same head.

In these facts, and in the ancient rule that a share of the tithes was for the poor, are perhaps, to be found the first rudiments of the doctrine that the State should help those who are otherwise helpless—in short, of our modern poor-laws. The poor, indeed, are frequently mentioned in the laws or dooms antecedent to the Conquest; but bare precepts, without records of the mode of working, though they may be used to build up a theory, give but little aid in the narration of facts. It must of course be remembered, that long before and long after the Conquest those classes of the laity which were nearest to the condition of paupers had, except perhaps in the towns, and among the numerous hordes of brigands, a superior lord, who, with all his brutality, would, for obvious reasons, be reluctant that a dependent should starve. The poor, in the modern sense of the term, could hardly have had any existence, except as poor townsmen or as poor ecclesiastics. Before the Conquest, the man who had no lord was regarded as a thief; after the Conquest, the same principle is apparent in those regulations by which a stranger was forbidden to remain more than one night in a town and the sheriffs of each county were commanded to register the names of all fugitives from other shires. The burden of relieving the poor must, therefore, have been but light, and was distributed in effect as nearly as possible in the manner in which it is distributed at the present time. It was borne not by the Church, but by the public—in part by the great land-holders, in part by those other classes which could afford to pay taxes. The king's revenue was the revenue of the State; and it was therefore practically at the expense of the State that all grants were made, and out of taxes upon the people that all deficiencies were repaired.

It is pleasant to dwell for a moment on this one bright spot in the desert of mediæval cruelties: to see that there was one form in which compassion was not wholly extinct—to know that a cripple, Charity. if he did not chance to be also a heretic, was sometimes supported by his more fortunate fellow-countrymen. It is pleasanter still to reflect that this charity—this higher conception of Christianity—prevailed, in the end, over that bigotry which made orthodoxy almost a synonym for ferocity. But any one who banishes from his mind those exhibitions of inhuman hatred which were called forth by the very name of a heretic cannot realise to himself the condition of society at the end of the twelfth century.

At this period numerous sects had arisen, and come into prominence in the south of France. In spite of persecution at home, they succeeded in making numerous converts abroad. One of them, known as that of the Publicans or Paterines, sprang up, or was revived, in Gascony, spread thence through France, Spain, Italy and Germany, and at last appeared in England. The preachers of the new doctrines in England were, it is said, not very numerous, and were Germans by birth. The contemporary writers differ very materially in their accounts of the success attained by these missionaries, but unite in attributing to them the most revolting doctrines and practices. In the nineteenth century, it is hardly necessary to remark that the tenets held by heretics in the twelfth century are not to be correctly ascertained from the writings of their adversaries; and the heretics have not been permitted to address posterity for themselves. It was, however, commonly believed that these Paterines scoffed at the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and abjured baptism, matrimony, and the unity of the Catholic Church. It was their custom, as reported, to meet in the evening in order that they might celebrate the rites which they declared to be essentially Christian and strictly in accordance with the teaching of the Apostles. The only positive doctrine which was enunciated was that true charity consisted in doing or suffering what any Christian brother or sister might desire. After certain hymns had been hummed, rather than sung, the lights were extinguished, and the brothers and sisters indulged their passions as

Appearance of heretics in England.

they pleased. So, at least, says Walter Mapes, afterwards Archdeacon of Oxford.

The Paterines, however, may be considered to have cleared themselves from the charge of mere reckless depravity by their conduct in the time of trial. They might have preserved their lives and ^{Inhuman treatment of them.} found opportunities for the gratification of their lusts had they been without real faith and willing to recant. But, though their converts wavered, the heretics who had come from beyond the sea, adhered stubbornly to their creed. A council of Bishops assembled at Oxford in the year 1160. The Paterines were bidden to do penance for their opinions and to be reconciled with the Church, but they were deaf both to persuasion and to threats, and they cried out, in the words of the Saviour, 'Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' The Bishops, without further delay, delivered the heretics to the civil arm for punishment. The Paterines displayed as much firmness as the martyrs of earlier times. Their foreheads were seared with a hot iron so that every passer-by might know the men who had committed the crime of thinking for themselves. Their garments were torn off from the waist upwards, and they were whipped publicly through the streets. They raised no cry in their anguish, they invoked no curses upon their tormenters, but they repeated again and again the words of their Master: 'Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for My sake.' Every Englishman was forbidden to give them food or shelter, and the brand on their faces marked them out as objects for the exercise of cruelty. An English ecclesiastic, who lived at the time, has related, in a tone of exultation, that it was winter when these unhappy foreigners were driven from the principal seat of English learning into the open country, that the frost was intense, that no honest English heart was moved to compassion by the harshness of the sentence, and that the enemies of the Church died in the torments of cold and starvation.

Cruelty begets cruelty as certainly as animals beget their like. When the Church slew her enemies in a described as heretics.

Brigands

manner which was not brutal only because brutes are more merciful, when ecclesiastics exhorted one another to inflict such punishments upon heretics that no human being might in future become heretical, the heretics themselves began to imitate their oppressors. Forbidden to worship as their consciences taught them, forbidden to enter the houses of orthodox believers, forbidden even to purchase the necessities of life, the persecuted who survived their persecutions were compelled to join communities of outlaws. There were many such bands, each numbering many thousands of persons in various parts of Europe. They served as mercenary soldiers under any prince who could afford to hire them or could promise them booty. They were known as Routiers or Brabazons, and it was said that some of them at least had been originally formed in Brabant. In their ranks any man was well received who could add to their strength, and any woman who could contribute to their pleasure. They never enquired too curiously into the faith of their associates, and they demanded no virtue except fidelity to their own body. When monasteries were sacked and the inmates murdered or ravished, when towns and even cities were burnt to the ground, and when it was discovered that there were at least some heretics among the offenders, the Church began to regard the Brabazons as one of the heretical sects. It does not, however, appear that they held any positive doctrine in common, or any sentiment except hatred of the constituted authority. In their body every class was represented, and every form of discontent was permitted to exist. They received with equal favour heretics of all shades of opinion, ecclesiastics who had incurred the censure of superiors, fugitive monks, robbers, and men who were in peril of death for political offences.

Mercenaries, such as were the Brabazons, and the Brabazons themselves were employed in the civil wars between Stephen on the one side, and the Empress and her son on the other. Henry II. Source of the prevailing barbarism. as soon as he was firmly established on the throne, sent the Brabazons out of the kingdom, probably at the instigation of the clergy. It does, not, however, appear that any great good was achieved by this attempt to abolish heresy and brigandage at one blow. The evil did not lie in a single sect, or a horde of robbers bearing a single name, or even in paying mercenaries to secure the throne. It was far more deeply seated in the barbarism of the times, and was inherited from those sad days when the Northern plunderers had torn the Roman Empire to pieces. It was not to be eradicated for many another generation, and has had its effect even upon the present age. Not all the legal reforms of Edward I. could do more than slightly modify it—much less the reforms of Henry II.

The position of the Jews, like the position of the heretics, illustrates at once the fanaticism and the lawlessness of the age. The heretics proscribed by councils could find refuge only among robbers Position of the Jews in England. less cruel than lawgivers. The Jews, under the king's protection, were never secure from attacks made by the whole Christian mob of any town in which they might have licence to dwell. Before the reign of John, at least, it must have been the real wish, as well as the expressed intention of the kings to keep the Jews harmless. They contributed in no small measure to the royal revenue, and diverted from the royal officers some of the odium which commonly falls upon the tax-gatherer. They became an important body in the country soon after the Conquest. A charter, confirmed by John, was said to have been granted to them by Henry I. The effect was that they might reside in England as free men, might travel from town to town, might claim redress if molested, and might even hold lands in pledge until a loan had been repaid. The benefits conferred by the Norman monarchs were, however, only an indication of services demanded in return. The Jews became, in fact, if not in name, officers of state, bearing a very close resemblance to those Publicans of the Roman Empire whom their forefathers had hated and shunned. In every town in which they settled they sat continually at the receipt of custom. The genius and traditions of their race rendered them, in all commercial knowledge, infinitely superior to the Englishmen by whom they were surrounded, and they practically farmed from the king a monopoly of the money-market. For the sums which they lent upon the security of land they sometimes gained sixty per cent. per annum, and they were at one time allowed by law to gain forty. The king, who exacted service of some kind from all his subjects, exacted a return for the privilege which he conferred of taking usury from his subjects. The accounts of the 'Jewry' thus became of great importance in the Exchequer, and as the nature of the transaction was not perceived in those rude times, the tax upon borrowers went ungrudged to the king. All the hatred of ruined men towards those who have ruined them; and all the jealousy which can be excited by superior skill and wealth were thus combined with a religious frenzy against the Jews, whose avarice certainly was not all their own.

When a London merchant hoped that the profits of bargains made in the morning might be increased by burglaries effected in the night, the life of a Jew must have been a life of ceaseless apprehensions and horrors. The trials which he was compelled to endure, not only in England, but elsewhere, excite wonder that his race survived, and invite admiration for the patience and for the tenacity with which it remained true to its faith under a martyrdom lasting for ages.

The treatment suffered by the Jews is, perhaps, best illustrated by the events to which the coronation-day of Richard I. gave birth. The whole of that day's doings were most characteristic of the age. The ceremony was one of more than ordinary magnificence, and all the most distinguished men in the country were present. From the king's chamber to the altar in Westminster Abbey, the way was covered with woollen cloths. In front of the procession, as though to proclaim 'Peace on earth, good will towards men,' marched the inferior clergy, who bore aloft the cross and the candles, sprinkled holy water right and left, and waved censers of burning incense while they sang in full chorus. They were followed in due order by the priors, the abbots, and the bishops, intermixed with whom were four barons holding four golden candlesticks. Next came earls and barons, each entrusted with some of the day of

*Scene on the Coronation-
Richard I.*

insignia of royalty—the sceptre, the dove, the golden-hilted swords in sheaths of cloth of gold, the robes, and the jewelled crown. Close behind the crown walked Richard himself, with a bishop on either hand, beneath a silken canopy, supported by four barons on four lances. A crowd of nobles and privileged officials brought up the rear. In the Abbey, Richard took the coronation oath, was anointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, robed, crowned, and enthroned according to custom. All seemed happy in Westminster that Sunday morning, all prepared to make merry. From the palace to the Abbey, and from the Abbey back to the palace, bright faces and gay colours seemed to betoken nothing but joy. The king and the nobles took their seats in the palace-hall, glad to exchange the restraint of the past solemnity for the freedom of a royal banquet. But in the midst of the feast, high above the loud voices and loud laughter of the rough king and his rough guests, were heard the sounds of strife in the outer court.

When the king had re-entered his palace, some of the leading members of the Jewish community, laden with costly gifts, attempted to make their way into the royal presence. The Jews had been expressly forbidden to show themselves at the coronation, for it had always been considered a profanation for a Jew to enter a Christian church, or to be present at a Christian ceremony. The intruders, for so they seem to have been considered by reason of the prohibition, were instantly known by their features to be Jews, and were expelled with insults and blows. The cry of ‘The Jews’ was raised, and that cry sufficed to rouse the whole populace to fury. It was Sunday, and every inhabitant of the city had been free to join the crowd at Westminster,

Massacre of the Jews in London.

to gain, perhaps, a glimpse of the procession, and to indulge himself in every pleasure within his reach. It was Sunday, and all London was making holiday in honour of the new and popular king. It was Sunday, and this was the day on which the Jews had dared to pollute the approaches to the royal court. It was Sunday, the Lord's day, the day on which the Redeemer had risen from the dead, after he had been crucified according to the wish of the Jews. 'The Jews!' cried the mob, bent on enjoying the day, and determined to have vengeance at once for all past iniquities, and for this new insult to the Christian faith and the Christian king. Irresistible numbers marched to the Jews' quarter in the city. They killed every Jew who came in their way. They broke into every Jewish house which was not strong enough to resist their blows. They passed all the afternoon of that Sunday, and the whole of the following night, in murder, robbery, and destruction. They set fire to the houses which they had sacked, and the flames spread to the dwellings of the Christians. They laid the richest part of the capital in ruins in showing their loyalty to Church and King. Such was the London of the twelfth century.

The news of this riot became the signal for attacks upon the Jews in many of the other principal towns. York was the scene of an outrage even more horrible than that which had disgraced London. At York.

The Jews became alarmed at the menaces of the populace, and fled for refuge to the Castle. The Constable promised them his protection and, for a time at least, kept his word. One day, however, he left the castle, and the Jews suspected that he intended to betray them, in order that he might secure for himself the greatest share of their wealth. In the extremity of their fear they closed the gates, and excluded the Constable from the castle in which he had given them shelter. Not only the mob, but the officers whose duty it was to hold the mob in check, were exasperated by this defiance of the king's authority. The castle was besieged, and the Jews had no hope either of succour or of escape. They saw that death was inevitable, and the greater portion of them resolved to disappoint the wrath of their enemies by committing suicide. With their own hands they killed their wives and children, set fire to the castle, and put an end to their own lives. When the Christians of York stormed the walls, they found no defenders, no human beings but a few wretches who had lacked the courage to anticipate their fate, or whose religious scruples had restrained them from following the example of their comrades. Upon these miserable suppliants for mercy the assailants were not ashamed to wreak their vengeance; and the last of the Jews in the castle was put to death by men who lived around the cathedral of an archbishop, and by men who displayed the Cross as soldiers devoted to the service of Christ.

At Lynn there was a riot, in which fire and sword were carried into the Jewish quarter; and while the houses of Jews were blazing, and the corpses
At Lynn, Stamford, and Lincoln. of Jews were strewn about the streets, the wealth which these enemies of Christianity had accumulated was carried on board ship. At Stamford, during the great fair, the Jews were compelled to take refuge in the Castle; and the Crusaders, who had been exhibiting their crosses to the wondering crowd, sacked the deserted houses, carried off their booty, and escaped all punishment. At Lincoln, too, there were outrages, of which the chroniclers have not preserved a full account, but which the Rolls of the Exchequer show to have been not less violent than those perpetrated in other towns. No adequate retribution overtook the offenders. A few only were hanged in London; in York thirty-nine, and in Lincoln no less than ninety-four were amerced for participation in these deeds of bloodshed. The lists of names are not without their interest; they show clearly that the mobs were not composed solely of common thieves or soldiers eager to practise those vices for which an indulgence had been proclaimed, but that the better classes of the population—the traders, the householders, and even the nobles—displayed zeal for the coming Crusade by attacking the Jews.

At this time—at the accession of Richard I.—all the chivalry of Europe affected to live for the single purpose of wresting the Holy Sepulchre from the Infidel. The whole of Christendom had been excited to a fervour such as had been unknown since the days of the early persecutions. It might, therefore, be supposed that, if the necessity for laws continued to exist in the midst of such religious enthusiasm, the existing laws were, at least, cheerfully obeyed, and that there could but rarely have been occasion for the infliction of punishment. As the imagination travels back through the long centuries of the past, it is tempted to raise a picture of the purest innocence animated by a spirit of the most holy self-denial. It sees heroes, absolutely without fear and without reproach, battling for no earthly honour, but fighting their way to the kingdom of heaven at the gates of Jerusalem. It hears the prayers of the sick, of the women, and of the little children for the success of the Christian arms. It has no eyes for the foulness of mediæval iniquity. The external aspect of a Crusade is not unlike a painting of some rich tropical scene, in which the artist bids us remember only the luxuriance of vegetation, the brightness of the sky, and the plumage of the birds—in which he makes us forget that disease is inhaled with every breath, and that corpses lie rotting in the jungle. Romance has made the Crusades her own, has exhibited to all the world the beauties which she has discovered in them, and has hidden away, where she could, the horrors of the age.

The Crusades
according to romance.

To the strength of the first two Crusades, the British Islands contributed little; but nothing, perhaps, better illustrates the moral condition of Northern Europe during the eleventh and twelfth centuries than the history of those expeditions. Historically they illustrate the moral condition of Europe. The forces which had received a plenary indulgence for all crimes, and which had been excited to more than ordinary ferocity by the language of preachers, commonly displayed the cruelty without the discipline of brigands. If they had devoted themselves to the service of God, they convinced the inhabitants of the towns on their line of march that they had ceased to respect the laws of man. They considered themselves privileged to gratify every wish and every lust as it arose. They recognised no rights of property, they felt no gratitude for hospitality, and they possessed no sense of honour. They violated the wives and daughters of their hosts when they were kindly treated, they devastated the lands of friends whom they had converted into enemies, they resorted to wanton robbery and destruction in revenge for calamities which they had brought upon themselves. They believed that they proved their superiority to Mahomedans by slaughtering the defenceless Jews; and this was the only exploit in which the first divisions of the Crusaders could boast of success. The bodies led by Walter Sans-Avoir, by Peter the Hermit, and by Gottschalk, suffered defeats almost as disgraceful as their previous conduct. After three years, however, of toil and suffering, and after a loss of lives which the chroniclers estimate by hundreds of thousands, the object of the first Crusade was attained, and the Christians were in possession of the Holy Sepulchre. Soldiers displaying conspicuously the Cross of the Prince of Peace burst in all the pride of war through the gates which He had entered meekly riding upon an ass. Where He had taught love, and pity, and tenderness, where they believed that He had healed the sick and raised the dead, they gave vent to all the passions of savages, they refused all quarter to their enemies, they caused torrents of blood to flow through the streets. On the very spot where Joseph and Mary had found Him instructing the Doctors, and where He had overthrown the tables of the money-changers in the Temple, one of the highest Christian generals eagerly seized, as his spoil, the treasures which had been stored in the Mosque of Omar.

In less than half a century it was discovered that a second Crusade had become necessary, in order to secure the gains of the first; and in the year 1147 Treacheries of the Crusaders. Conrad III. of Germany, and Louis VII. of France took the cross. But the sins of the first crusaders were visited on the soldiers of the second Crusade. The court of Constantinople had not grown more friendly to the western adventurers in the interval between the two expeditions; it regarded them with well-merited suspicion, and thwarted them by every device which could be brought into play without an open exhibition of hostility. After much loss and many defeats, they made their way to Palestine, when the sovereigns consulted together and resolved to attack Damascus. When the siege had been carried on with so much success that the garrison saw no hope of safety, some of the Christian leaders accepted bribes from the enemy, and deserted. The two monarchs, perceiving that their enterprise must be fruitless, left their followers to straggle home as best they might, and made their way with all speed to their own dominions. The kingdom of Jerusalem which had been established as the result of the first Crusade was, perhaps, maintained in existence for a few years by the second. There ended the advantage ; honour there was none. The treachery which had rendered the siege of Damascus fruitless was imitated by a Christian commander in the year 1187. It was not difficult for the Count of Tripoli to dispose the Christian forces to the advantage of Saladin, when the chiefs of the Christians had more jealousy of each other than zeal for their cause. A great defeat of the Christians at Tiberias was followed by the fall of the Holy City itself. Saladin, with a generosity which his adversaries might have won credit in imitating, granted the possession of the Sepulchre to his defeated enemies. But neither policy nor passion would permit the court of Rome to acquiesce tamely in such a loss as they had sustained, or to recognise any virtue in an unbeliever. A third Crusade was immediately proclaimed, and this time the frenzy extended itself in full force to England. It was checked, indeed, by the war of Henry II. with Philip of France, and with his own son. But upon the accession of Richard, a prince so virtuous and valorous that, if he could not use his sword elsewhere, he was glad to wield it against his father, the smouldering fire burst into flame.

The young Richard seemed in popular estimation to be the incarnation of all that is kingly and chivalrous. He fought, as his contemporaries proudly boasted, with the heart of a lion; and he seems to have possessed as much courage, as high a sense of justice, as tender a regard for the helpless, as the noble beast of the forest. The expedition to the Holy Land appealed to the popular imagination; and all classes were agreed that there could not be a braver commander or one more fit, according to all precedent, to bear the name of Crusader. What mattered it that he had leagued himself with his brother to undo his father, if he was willing, like a true knight, to league himself with the French king to undo the infidel Soldan? If he sold bishoprics and offices, it was no more than his predecessors had done before him, and if he had declared that he would sell London itself to raise money, did not the end sanctify the means—did not the expression itself show a generous nature?

To those who are familiar with the characteristics of the age handed down through many centuries of barbarism, it will not seem strange that the young king was popular—that his cheerful mien and his brawny frame atoned, in the eyes of the populace, for the absence of qualities which they had not learned to miss. His army was an army of Crusaders little if at all less savage than the hordes which Peter the Hermit had brought together nearly a century before; and these Crusaders were the picked men among the masses of our forefathers, carrying with them the sympathies of their fellow-countrymen. They were Crusaders fit to serve under the Prince of Crusaders—ready, indeed, to risk their lives in fair fight, but not less ready to murder an

Character of
Richard Cœur
de Lion.

His popularity.

unarmed Jew, or to break any one of the last six commandments. The admiration of Richard, which long survived and still survives in song, shows how completely he represented the popular notion of a good king, and how indifferent men were to any qualities except mere physical courage and that gay and careless temperament which often accompanies it.

The embarkation of Richard's army, however, was a great event in the history of England. The men who sailed were unconsciously helping to destroy the distinction between Normans and Englishmen, and to weld the two classes into one nation, in accordance with the policy of the Conqueror and his successors. Their enterprise, hopeless in a military sense, was full of promise to anyone, had such there been, who could have looked beyond the range of mediæval bigotry and mediæval aspirations. But the benefits which the Crusades were to confer not only upon England but upon Western Europe were not yet, and could not for many years become, apparent. Regarded apart from the results which could not have been foreseen, they were the crowning effort of barbarism animated by superstition.

The ordinances for the voyage to the Holy Land show, in a few unambiguous sentences, the character of the soldiers who sailed, and of the knights who commanded them. Whoever killed a man on board ship was to be tied to the corpse and thrown with it into the sea. Whoever killed a man on shore was to be tied to the corpse and buried alive with it. Drawing blood with a knife was to be punished with the loss of a hand; a mere blow, with three complete duckings in the sea. A thief was to be shaved, to have boiling pitch poured upon his head, and a cushion of feathers shaken over it, so that his misdeed might be known to all; and he was to be put ashore at the first place at which the ship touched.

Remote advantages of the Crusades.

The Age of Chivalry illustrated by the ordinances made for the Crusaders.

Such was the age of chivalry some time after its beginning; such the rules by which Christian kings attempted to enforce discipline among Christian heroes of romance. To the leaders, who could not write their own names, deception and treachery were as familiar as force; to their followers rapine and murder were so congenial that, in the absence of Saracens, Jews, or townsfolk, it seemed but a professional pastime to kill or to rob a comrade in arms.

CHAPTER III.

FROM THE THIRD CRUSADE TO THE YEAR BEFORE THE BLACK DEATH.

THE period exhibits remarkable contrasts.

THERE is probably no period in history so strongly marked by glaring contrasts as the thirteenth century and the first half of the fourteenth. During that time many towns rose from a condition very nearly approaching serfdom to the dignity of sending representatives to Parliament, the laws were greatly improved and developed in every branch, the strength of the kingdom was increased by the conquest of Wales, and the distinction of race between Norman ruler and English subject ceased to exist. But, on the other hand, the ferocity of the barbarians who had overrun the Roman empire had struck root so deeply that it could not yet be eradicated from the masses of the population, and often overshadowed the more enlightened law-givers. The right of private war lost its legal sanction, and the exaction of revenge by an individual began to be a crime against the state. But, on the other hand, individuals continued to value their own privileges far more than the common weal; and the lords of every manor, and the seamen of every port, were still reluctant to abandon the appeal to force when they believed the issue would be in their own favour. To one who studies only the history of the constitution, it will appear that marvellous progress had been made at the end of the reign of Edward I. ; to one who studies only the history of the people, it will appear that but little progress had been made even when Edward III. was in his prime ; to one who studies both, it will become manifest that civilisation is, like a forest tree, easily cut down by a few strokes of the axe, but slow of growth, and not to be matured by the mere will of kings or legislators. The extinction of Roman civilisation in Britain may be related in a few sentences ; volumes barely suffice to show how England became civilised in later times.

The growth of the towns, which was freer and fuller after the disorganisation of feudal society consequent on the Black Death, seems to have been previously confined within certain well-marked limits. London, always held in respect by kings, even before the Conquest, was the model to which the other towns attempted to assimilate themselves. It had received a general confirmation of its ancient privileges from the Conqueror ; but not until the reign of Henry I. did it become, in the legal language of the day, quit of murder. Before this time the towns, like the rural hundreds, or, perhaps, in some cases, as part of the hundreds, must have been compelled to make presentments of Englishry, and to pay for a Frenchman slain within the walls. It was no small advance towards escape from the reproach of subjection to a foreign yoke when the Englishman was promoted to equality with the Norman in the city of London. But the majority of the towns do not appear to have obtained exemption from the murder-fine earlier than the reign of Richard I. ; nor had they all obtained it at the end of the reign of

The Towns
become quit of the murder-fine.

John. The royal favour had to be purchased for money ; and it was not until the Crusades had caused property to change hands, and had stimulated intercourse with the Continent, that the burghers were able to pay for new privileges, or the kings were willing to grant them. The townsmen, when their opportunity came, seem to have thought first of securing some position which had been lost or imperilled at the time of the Conquest. If they are not exempted from the murder-fine in so many words, they receive a confirmation of their ancient liberties and customs ; of the ancient liberties and customs which they enjoyed in the time of King Edward ; of the privilege of clearing themselves, in the Pleas of the Crown, according to the ancient custom of their city. To the citizens of London is expressly granted the ancient right of compurgation by the charter of Henry I. ; and the inhabitants of many other towns regain it indirectly by clauses in later charters, which place them, in criminal matters, on the same footing as the capital.

The Londoners maintain that their ancestors hunted on the Chiltern Hills and throughout the counties of Middlesex and Surrey ; the king allows their claim, and, though sport is a pleasure almost exclusively royal, permits them to enjoy it as freely as their forefathers. Similar indulgences are afterwards granted on a smaller scale elsewhere, and probably for similar reasons. Thus Richard I. allows the burgesses of Colchester to hunt the fox, the hare, and the cat. The grant of a borough to its inhabitants is sometimes made in the same form as a grant of land to a favoured noble or to a religious house. They are to hold their liberties well and in peace, freely and quietly, wholly, fully, and with honour, in woodland and in clear-land, in roads and in other privileges.

They obtain

paths, in meadows and in pastures, in fees and in demesnes, in waters and in mills, in fish-ponds and in fisheries, in moors and in marshes—as well without the walls as within, as far as their free customs extend.

It would be of no practical use to enquire, in this place, what was the origin of such claims as those which were successfully asserted by London. In the absence of sufficient historical testimony, a con-^{Their guilds.}clusion, however ingeniously drawn, has to struggle for existence against rival conclusions or rival prejudices, and the matter is left in the end precisely where it was before the discussion began—in doubt. It is impossible to give at once a clear and a trustworthy description of the precise political position of any town as existing before the Conquest, and for that reason it is most difficult to estimate at their true value the town-charters of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The curt sentences of Domesday are not less prone to excite an appetite for the information which they withhold than gratitude for the information which they impart. They tell us that a brewer of bad ale in Chester was exposed, whether male or female, on the seat of filth ; but they do not tell us that there was a guild merchant at Lincoln. Possibly there was not ; but the charter granted to the citizens of Lincoln by Henry II. allows them their guild merchant, as enjoyed by them in the time of his predecessors, including Edward the Confessor. There is not complete uniformity in the returns from the various counties entered in Domesday ; and, as according to the book itself, there were guilds of burgesses at Canterbury and Dover before the Conquest, it is by no means impossible that the claim of Lincoln may be founded on fact. When King John gives a charter to Gloucester, the guild merchant is mentioned as already existing, and the burgesses who belong to it are exempted from certain imposts. In many other charters, including one granted as early as the reign of Henry I. to Beverley, the guild and the guildhall or hanse-house are introduced in such a manner that they seem rather to gain a new legal recognition than to be newly established. In none of those granted to English towns are the words identical with the words employed towards the burghers of Niort, who obtain a licence not simply to have a guild or commune, but to establish one which they may afterwards enjoy.

In the reign of Henry I. the citizens of London obtained, or regained, the privilege of electing their own sheriffs, and took the county of Middlesex to farm. In other words, the elective sheriffs of London were thenceforward sheriffs also of Middlesex, and paid a fixed annual sum into the Exchequer in satisfaction of all ordinary payments due from the county. The position of the city after this concession was not only stronger than that of any town, but stronger also than that of any shire in the country, for there is no doubt that after the Conquest the sheriffs were usually nominated by the king. Before the end of John's reign the principal towns had so far followed the example set them by London, that they could choose their own chief magistrate, subject only to the king's approval, and were independent of the jurisdiction claimed by the sheriffs of the counties in which they stood. Individual townsmen could now hold their lands in burgage—a tenure as free as socage, which was the freest lay tenure known in the shires. The villein who could escape the observation of his lord, and remain in a chartered town for a year and a day unmolested, could be a member of the guild, commune, or corporation, and become a free man ever afterwards. It is not, indeed, probable that until the Black Death had taught the labourer his value, freedom was often acquired, in this manner, by the bondsman fleeing from his lord. It may be, too, that the towns collectively gained by the third Crusade nothing which some towns, at least, had not enjoyed before the Conquest; but it is quite certain that if they had not yet raised themselves to a level absolutely higher than any attained under the West Saxon dynasty, they had been the first to recover from the effects of the disaster near Hastings. Their fellow-countrymen in the rural districts were contemptuously regarded as mere Englishry long after the burgesses were known simply as burgesses. The relative positions of classes thus underwent a change, at the time almost imperceptible, but in the end of no little importance to English civilisation.

They recover from the effects of the Conquest sooner than the rural districts.

The advantages secured by the towns were, however, not free from certain adverse influences, springing in part from the very sources of benefit. If the towns-
They are in danger of reverting to the old forms of barbarism.
man became more wealthy through the increase of commerce, if he learned from the Crusaders how the towns of Italy could dictate terms, instead of accepting them from feudal chiefs, and was animated by a spirit of emulation, the traditions of the past were continually directing his energies into the groove which led back towards the old forms of barbarism. If he freed himself from the duel, he reverted to compurgation; if he excluded the Sheriffs and Hundred-men he also excluded the King's Justices; if he strengthened his town-organisation he retarded the unification of the kingdom. Even if he took the Italian cities for his models, he would always have in his mind the fact that each of them fought under its own leaders for its own benefit, and preferred its own right of making war to such an abstract idea as that of national unity.

It is necessary to bear well in mind this continual conflict of causes, this atavism of the barbarous wherever barbarism has once been introduced among any population. The excessively slow growth of civilisation in England at a time when legislation was specially favourable to its progress, cannot otherwise be easily understood. Before the end of the thirteenth century, the principle of representation in a national parliament had been accepted by the land-holders, by the clergy, and by the townsmen. This was a most important step towards that consolidation which had always been the aim of the Norman or French sovereigns, though it had been made in the manner least agreeable to their ideas of government. It would be foreign to the purposes of this history to describe at length the conflicting efforts of the different estates of the realm. They have left their marks in Magna Carta and its many confirmations, and in the Statutes passed after Simon de Montfort had set the great precedent of summoning a truly national assembly. But there are some points in the great constitutional struggle which cannot be dismissed without notice. Before the Conquest the king was assisted by a council, styled, when it assembled, the Meeting of the Wise, at which the bishops and chief land-holders held seats. Immediately after the Conquest there was a council of a very similar character, of which the members were also lay and ecclesiastical. It cannot be stated with certainty on what occasions the king summoned his council either before or immediately after the Conquest, because the writs of summons are not in existence. For similar reasons it is impossible to decide whether the council

They begin to be represented in the legislative body.

filled vacancies in its own body, or the king had unlimited power to select new councillors as he pleased. Nor indeed is it necessary to suppose that there was any abstract theory of constitutional government, or even any consistency of practice at a time when king and nobles were alike ready for an appeal to arms on the slightest provocation. Of representatives freely elected by the people, or a considerable portion of it, there was no trace. As soon, however, as the towns began to have a recognised corporate existence they began also to send representatives, elected by the members of their corporation, to Westminster. In the charters in which their various liberties and immunities are secured there is commonly a provision that their common council shall elect two of their more lawful and discreet men and present them to the Chief Justice at the Treasury with a statement of accounts. This is a most important advance towards parliamentary representation and towards the constitutional doctrine that the right of granting supplies belongs to the Commons. The two burgesses, at this early stage, have, it is true, no discretionary power given them by their electors ; they do not meet the burgesses of other towns, nor any knights from the shires ; they are simply entrusted with the care of certain documents which they are prepared to explain and to justify on the part of their fellow-townsmen. But on the other hand they are the means of communication between the king (or his representative, the chief justice) and their constituents in all matters of finance ; they become familiar examples of the representative principle in combination with free election ; they suggest an expedient for future use ; and in the struggle which calls forth a national assembly they are naturally transformed into members of parliament.

A combination of three antagonistic principles was effected in that stage of national growth in which a national parliament became an established institution. Unification, the great leading idea of the Conqueror and his house, was realised in a central legislative body; local independence, dear alike to the shires and to the towns, found its expression in local representation; representation, the enemy alike of localisation and of despotic rule, took both by the hand and reconciled them to each other by means of a compromise.

The townsmen, brought into contact with representatives from the shires, now began to exert an influence, at first very slight and not in all respects beneficial, upon the lives and occupations of other Englishmen.

Fusion of opposing principles.

*First effects
of town influence.* England seems at this time and long afterwards, to have grown, on the average, only sufficient corn for home consumption. Permissions to export corn alternate, in the Records, with prohibitions, apparently according to the abundance of the harvests near the coast. The greater part of the land, where it was cleared, must have been grass land. The chief commerce was the export of wool to Flanders where better and finer cloth could be made than any of native manufacture. A cloth, however, of coarser quality was made in England and even exported to Norway, and there were at least as early as the twelfth century guilds of weavers in London, Oxford, York, Nottingham, Huntingdon, Lincoln, and Winchester. One of the great objects of the townsmen when they acquired a little power, was to prevent the import of foreign manufactures and even the export of English wool, and they sometimes succeeded in obtaining a proclamation favourable, as they supposed, to their interests. The export duties on wool were, however, too fertile a source of revenue to be abandoned; and a far better plan was carried into execution when a colony of Flemings was introduced into England by Edward III. in order that they might teach his subjects the art of which they enjoyed the sole possession. A most favourable impulse was thus given to an important branch of national industry, but its full effects do not yet become perceptible.

Perhaps, a more certain indication that commerce had already begun to exercise an influence over the thoughts and actions of men is to be discovered in certain changes of the law. In the reign of Edward I. land was, by two statutes, made liable for debts contracted in trade—a most convincing proof that the trading classes were beginning to show some power in the House of Commons, and possibly also that the land-holders were beginning to engage in commerce.

The proportion of the trading or town population to that of the country will, however, probably afford a better gauge of the strength of commercial interests than any isolated facts to be gleaned from the Statute Book. Thus much it is possible to ascertain with some approach to accuracy, even though it may be impossible to discover what was the total population of England. Fortunately there exists a roll on which appears the number of men demanded by Edward II. (when he intended to make an expedition to Gascony) from every county except the palatinates, and from almost every town except the Cinque Ports. There can be no doubt that the force required from each place bore a certain ratio to the total of males between the ages of sixteen and sixty, who were at this time all liable to military service, and whom it was the duty of the Commissioners of Array to muster and inspect.

Proportion of town population to rural population.

The first demand upon the shires (afterwards considerably reduced) was for 410 'hommes d'armes,' 1,020 hoblers, 2,190 archers, and 19,220 ordinary foot soldiers—making a total of 22,840. The first demand upon the towns (afterwards reduced in only three instances) was for 1,950 men, who were all to be ordinary foot soldiers. The towns were therefore held capable of supplying less than a twelfth part of the whole national army; or, in other words, it was supposed that the males between the ages of sixteen and sixty were distributed, in country and town, in about the proportion of eleven to one. Nor was this a mere supposition, for the views of frank-pledge, and the rolls relating to the Assise of Arms, must have given our forefathers a very clear insight into the population of every district; and the levies were, no doubt, made in accordance with well-ascertained facts. The proportion of women and children to adult males may of course be assumed as identical in all parts of the country, and it therefore seems reasonable to believe that the town population has been fairly estimated, and been set in its true place in the whole population of the kingdom. When the result is compared with the figures given in the census of 1811, it is possible to arrive at some idea of the great social revolution through which the country had passed in the interval. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, only 32 per cent. of the whole population were engaged in agricultural pursuits; the 32 per cent. had diminished to 25 per cent. in 1841; and the time seems now to be approaching when the rural districts will contain as small a fraction of the whole English population as the towns contained in the reign of Edward II.

In the roll from which these details have been gathered may be discovered also some other facts which show a little more minutely the distribution of the population, and aid in defining the true position of the towns. London was credited with three times as many inhabitants as any other city or town in the realm. Next in rank, and all equal, were the towns near the chief seats of the worsted manufacture and woollen trade—Norwich, Lynn, and Great Yarmouth. York and Bristol were the only two others which were each expected to send a hundred men—as many as each of the three chief towns of the eastern counties. Lincoln stood next, and was asked for eighty men. Then came Winchester, Exeter, Shrewsbury, Hereford, and Oxford, which were each to send sixty. Canterbury, Ipswich, Northampton, Salisbury, Southampton, Bury St. Edmunds, and Beverley were each set down for fifty. Kingston-on-Hull was at first asked for forty, but the number was, as in the cases of Beverley and York, afterwards reduced. The demand upon Coventry was for thirty; upon Nottingham, Wells, Gloucester, Worcester, Chichester, and Boston, for twenty men each; upon Derby and Bath, for sixteen each; upon Rochester, Warwick, Stafford, Grantham, Stamford, and Huntingdon, for fifteen each. Maidstone, Southwark, Cirencester, Newark, and Ely, were required to muster no more than ten each; Somerton and Bedford, no more than six each. Barton-on-the-Humber, Grimsby, Scarborough, and Ravensrode are entered on the roll, but the scribe omitted to place the number of men opposite their names. The other towns which may have been in existence outside the counties palatine, and exclusive of the Cinque Ports, were apparently of too little importance to receive a separate summons, and their men were included in the general force of the counties.

The most populous county was Lincolnshire, which was required to send twelve hundred men of all arms ; Kent and Norfolk hardly fell behind it. Yorkshire, in spite of its great area, held only the fourth rank, and was set down for a thousand and eighty men. Elsewhere there was nothing specially worthy of remark except that the counties on the sea-coast were considerably more populous than those inland. This fact is, however, of importance, as showing the first effects of commerce upon the distribution of the population. The defective condition of the roads forbade inland traffic of any magnitude ; there was no considerable inland manufacture, and the district nearest to the sea was therefore of necessity the first to feel the beneficial effects of trade. Goods could be carried a few miles to the nearest port, but, as will hereafter be seen, it would have been impossible to convey them in any great quantity any great distance. No one would have attempted even to find a market for corn a hundred miles from home ; and the inhabitants of one county might be in the enjoyment of plenty, while the inhabitants of another were starving. It was, no doubt, the difficulty of internal communication which caused the chief seat of trade to be in the eastern counties, whence it was easy to sail for Flanders with wool and wool-fells, or to Norway with worsteds. The branches of agricultural industry which were connected with the production of these exports naturally flourished in the immediate neighbourhood ; and thus it came to pass that if the sea-board generally was the most populous part of England, the eastern counties were the most populous parts of the sea-board.

London was the only city which was more populous than its surrounding county ; and from the fact that

First effects of Commerce upon the distribution of the population.

its inhabitants numbered more than those of Middlesex may, perhaps, be inferred the general scantiness of the population throughout England. The London of those days was not the London of ours, but the 'City,' and nothing more. The proclamations against building in the suburbs, for which the reigns of the Tudors are remarkable, were yet to remain for many generations unnecessary. It is, therefore, most significant that the comparatively small area on which old London stood sent three hundred men to battle, when Middlesex sent only two hundred and forty. The only possible inference is that the rural houses and hamlets were few and thinly scattered, even in the district from which the capital was supplied with the necessities of life.

Scantiness of the population as a whole.

In the important document from which these details have been gathered, the antagonism of burgher and baron is reflected from the description of the forces. From the shires are summoned men of all arms—cavalry, archers, and ordinary foot-soldiers; from the towns only foot-soldiers, who constituted, indeed, the bulk of the army, but who were held in the lowest estimation. In every class there was a struggle for privilege. The old spirit of partisanship survived in all its narrowness. The feudal aristocracy, already perhaps jealous of the progress made by the townsmen in freedom and wealth, attempted, though not always so successfully as in the present instance, to retain in their own hands all the higher military duties. The townsmen, striving to free themselves from the extortions and the insolence of aristocratic sheriffs and justices, were no less anxious to assert their rights in opposition to the townsmen of a rival borough than against the knights who affected to despise them. Sympathy extended as yet no farther than the guild commercial or the guild social. Inherited barbarism prompted every man to regard his neighbours as enemies; to take from others what others could not keep; to exclude others from advantages which he had secured for himself or his guild. In such an age it was inevitable that all who engaged in commerce should attempt to secure monopolies in the pettiest form—that they should attempt to expel others from fields of commercial enterprise, in the same manner as their knightly neighbours expelled weaker knights from coveted lands. Thus the citizens of London, being more powerful than other citizens, obtained commercial privileges throughout England, which were reserved when charters were granted to other towns. Thus townsmen of other boroughs showed at least as much anxiety to exclude rivals from the rights which they acquired as to acquire those rights for themselves. Thus were introduced such clauses as that which appears in the charter to Hereford, after the guild-merchant had been legally recognised:—‘We have granted that no one who is not of that guild shall buy or sell in the city or its suburbs without the consent of the citizens.’

Narrow-mindedness among the townsmen and other classes.

This narrowness of spirit, which, in spite of many improvements in legislation, was common to all classes,

This was illustrated in the treatment of the Jews.

was sometimes rendered doubly injurious by an alliance of one class with another for the purpose of destroying a third. If it could be said with strict precision of language that a nation can commit a crime, it would be true that one of the greatest national crimes ever committed, was committed in England when the Jews were expelled through the combined influence of the clergy, the traders, and the barons. But that is not a crime which is in accordance with law, and it was by law that the Jews were compelled to leave the country. This most remarkable episode in English history is specially worthy of note in a History of Crime both because it is in itself an illustration of the bigotry, jealousy, and contracted partisanship through which barbarism has to pass in its progress towards civilisation, and because there is good reason to suspect that it has a very close connection with one of the most audacious robberies ever perpetrated.

The principles of commerce, nowhere very well understood in the thirteenth century, were best understood by the Italians and the Jews. In all the chief towns of England there was a Jewish quarter, Envy excited by them; their superior knowledge of commerce. only too often the object of such attacks as those which followed the coronation of Richard I. The inhabitants were allowed to possess a certain organisation which was in later reigns designated, like that of a chartered town, a commune. It will be readily understood by all who realise to themselves the character of the age that these aliens were regarded with the most bitter hatred by the traders who were less successful in trade, by the land-holders whose patrimony was consumed in satisfying the demands of the usurers, and by the clergy, who, like the land-holders, fell into debt, and who were as implacable in their faith-feud as their ancestors had been in the blood-feud. Envy was added to other causes of animosity, and the Jews who had grown rich were commonly supposed to have gained their riches by every kind of crime which can be applied to the acquisition of property.

It was, therefore, no doubt, partly in accordance with popular feeling, though principally, as before explained, to secure a very important branch of revenue, that certain clauses were introduced into the regulations for the Jewry promulgated soon after the return of Richard I. from the Holy Land. Every Jew was to make oath that he would cause all his debts, securities and possessions of every kind to be registered, and that he would not only be guilty of no concealment himself, but would give information to the Justices of any concealment attempted by others, of all forgeries, and of all clippings of the coin. In these last provisions were embodied the popular belief concerning the practices of the Jews—a belief, indeed, not wholly unfounded, but at least equally true when applied to other classes.

During the first nine years of John's reign the Jews lived in prosperity. But, when the necessities of the weak and treacherous king increased, the smallest loss of revenue became a danger to his throne, and he discovered or suspected that the Jews were in the habit of concealing their wealth and sending a false account to the Exchequer. This offence, it must be remembered, legally subjected them to the loss of all non-registered possessions and must have been in the king's eyes an unpardonable violation of the agreement according to which their rights of person and property were secured.

There is a famous story of a Jew of Bristol which proves that John's suspicions were not altogether unfounded. This man, had been guilty, perhaps, of some other offences, but certainly of attempting to defraud the king. He was required to pay ten thousand marks and the result shows that his accusers were well informed of his hidden treasures. The money-lender protested that he did not possess in the whole world so much as was demanded of him, that he was an honest man, and much poorer than he was supposed to be. He was sternly bidden to make his choice—either to obey the king's command or to lose a tooth every day until his jaws were toothless. He still refused, he still denied his riches, he still asserted the truthfulness of his accounts. The king's officers began to execute their threat, and one of the Jew's teeth was drawn. His fortitude was not less remarkable than his wealth. He still maintained that he was innocent and poor; he still argued that he could not give what he did not possess. A second tooth was drawn, and still his resolution was unshaken. He submitted for seven successive days to the cruel torture, and then his courage gave way. He confessed his dishonesty and paid the money. Though it is difficult to repress a feeling of pity for the Jew, whose money was extorted from him in a most lawless fashion, who preferred the loss of seven teeth to the loss of his wealth and the loss of his wealth to the loss of an eighth tooth, it would be unjust to regard him merely as the helpless victim of a tyrannical king. He lived in a lawless age, in which little was thought of any mutilation, and he had grown rich by a succession of dishonest practices. His sufferings would have been averted had he rendered a true account of his wealth. The documents kept in the Common Chest of the Jews would have been accepted as sufficient evidence of his possessions, and a reluctance to pay on his part would have been met simply by a seizure of his goods and chattels on the part of the king.

They have various frauds attributed to them.

The story of the Jew of Bristol.

After this time the kings were less able and, perhaps, less willing to protect the Jewry against its enemies. The royal authority was growing weaker—especially in all matters connected with the

Hostility of the Clergy to the Jews.

revenue. The privileges of the Jews were somewhat curtailed by Magna Carta. The influence of the Church began to make itself felt in opposition to the enemies of its faith. The ecclesiastical policy had long been to render the life of a Jew intolerable in every Christian community. During the earlier years of the reign of Henry III. a plan devised at Rome was adopted in England. It had the merits of great simplicity, and some ingenuity, but was hardly inferior in cruelty to the most cruel tortures of the Inquisition. At a time when a Jew was a mark for the blows of every ruffian and every Crusader, an order was obtained under the king's seal that all male Jews should wear a badge. They were forbidden to appear outside their houses, without two strips of white linen or parchment fastened conspicuously on the upper garment. Stephen Langton, then Archbishop of Canterbury, would gladly have distinguished the Jewesses in the same manner as the Jews, and have caused the fingers of all good Christians to point at them in scorn. A decree to that effect was passed at a synod held at Oxford, but was not enforced by royal authority till a later period.

About seventy years before the expulsion of the Jews from England the animosity of the clergy against them begins to be most conspicuous, and
The Clergy desired their expulsion. another cause for it appears in addition to religious fanaticism. In the third year of Henry's reign, Pandulf, the Pope's Legate, was Bishop Elect of Norwich and placed himself at once in the van of persecution. The moment was most opportune for the execution of every clerical design. The king was but a child. Peter des Roches, Bishop of Winchester, and Hubert de Burg were joint guardians of the realm. Pandulf wrote a letter to them in which he declared that he could no longer bear with patience the continual clamourings of the Christians against the wicked ways of the Jews. This perfidious people, he said, was always extorting immoderate and oppressive usury from Christians in direct opposition to the decree of the Lateran Council. The victims were so exhausted that they could hardly breathe. His indignation was specially excited by the misfortunes of his dear sons the Abbot and Monks of Westminster. A Jew, named Isaac of Norwich, vexed them unceasingly with suits to be pleaded before the justices of the Jews. Pandulf therefore, requested, or rather commanded the Bishop of Winchester and Hubert de Burg to give instructions to the justices of the Jews for the postponement of the hearing of a cause, in which the abbot was defendant, until the legate could himself be present. It would then, he added, be time to consider, how an end could be made of these evil practices, and how the great stumbling block could be cast out of the kingdom.

This is the first indication of any design to expel the Jews ; and it is worthy of remark that, although Pandulf begins his epistle by expressions of deep com-miseration for all believers who may be suffering from Jewish extortion, he ends it by asking a special indulgence for his own friends. The abbot and monks of Westminster were in debt ; the scandal of their case and others like it suggested to the legate not that the debt should be paid and that the debtors should be more prudent in future, but that the debt should remain unpaid and that the creditors should be exiled beyond the seas. The Abbey of Westminster, however, was in no worse case than many other religious houses which had mortgaged their lands to the Jews. Tithes, too, which were originally destined for the benefit of the poor, the repair

The clergy
were in debt
to them.

of the church and the support of the minister, became the security of the Jewish capitalists ; and in the smallest of the English counties there were at least three parsons at one time who had given bonds to the money-lenders—the parson of Luffenham, the parson of Whissendine, and the parson of Morcott.

Isaac of Norwich, who roused the wrath of the legate by demanding his interest from the Abbot of West-
A contemporary caricature of them. minster, was one of the wealthiest and most powerful of the Jews, and therefore excited the jealousy of all classes in the highest degree. He was not only a money-lender, but a merchant. He possessed a quay at Norwich, at which his vessels could lade or unlade their freights. Whole districts were mortgaged or otherwise pledged to him at once. Letters were frequently addressed to him in the king's name. He was probably the richest man among the Jews of Norwich, and, no doubt, infinitely richer than any of his fellow-townsmen who were Christians. He appears as the principal figure in a cartoon, with which a satirical clerk in the Exchequer adorned the head of a roll. The drawing, though rude, is full of life and spirit. The scene is laid on the walls of a castle. Isaac stands in the centre of a group, with his head and shoulders above all the surrounding figures. He presents three faces, one in the centre looking to the front, and one on each side in profile. Surmounting the three is a crown, and it is perhaps to be supposed that there is a fourth face concealed from the spectator, and that the Jew is a monarch surveying his possessions in every quarter from which the wind can blow. On the right of Isaac stands Mosse Mokke, another Jew of Norwich, and on the left Avegay, a money-lending Jewess. A horned demon touches each of these two on the nose—one with the right fore-finger, the other with the left. On the right of Mosse Mokke is a figure holding a pair of scales heaped up on each side with coins. On the left of Avegay is Dagon, the god of the Philistines, who is seated on a turret, and has evidently become the faithful subject of the Jew. Further still to the left are three demons in armour, one of whom holds another pair of scales with more coins. Though six centuries have passed away since the sketch was made, there are many of the allusions which it is impossible to mistake. The castle of which the Jew is master tells of the jealousies which were roused by the acquisitions of the usurers, and shows that popular feeling was already prepared for the decree which subsequently forbade the Jews to hold land. The coins and scales point to the means by which it was commonly supposed that all the Jews grew rich—to the devices of clipping and counterfeiting. As Mosse Mokke was subsequently hanged, it may be reasonably inferred that he was at last found guilty of the crime of which he had long been suspected. All the principal figures may be considered not only as caricatures of real persons, but as types of a class. Isaac represents the greatest men among the Jews who, in wealth at least, were the equals of proud barons ; Mosse Mokke represents the commoner sort of Jews, who were, perhaps, in some instances not content with sixty-five per cent. per annum as the interest for their money. Avegay represents the Jewesses who were usurers, who were so numerous and who so frequently bore the same name, that it is impossible to determine which of them the draughtsman intended to portray.

The wealth accumulated by the Jews had long excited the covetousness and the wonder of every class ; but about the year 1235 the appearance of the

 The Jews and the Pope's money-changers. Caursins, who were permitted to style themselves ' the Pope's Money-changers,' produced a ferment throughout England. The spectacle of Christians practising all the Jewish devices, and growing as rich as the Jews themselves, excited the cupidity of all ranks. Every man was eager to have his neighbour in his debt, and to receive sixty pounds per annum for every hundred which he lent. The field, however, seems in the end to have been divided between the Caursins and the Jews—the only two classes which had sufficient knowledge to make their trade permanently successful. The objects with which these Pope's Money-changers were sent into England was no doubt to aid in expelling the Jews—an object never lost from view from the time when it was first set forth in Pandulf's letter. An attempt had already been made to deprive the Jews of food, by an injunction of the Archbishop of Canterbury that no Christian should supply their wants—though this had been superseded by the king's writs. According to the spirit of the age, the possession of a privilege by any class naturally excited a desire in another class not to participate in it, but to seize it. That which had been granted to the Jews the clergy, therefore, naturally enough wished to appropriate for the Caursins.

The Jews were, however, for some time successful in preserving their wealth. They had the means of doing
 The Jews bribe the Justices. that which was now and long afterwards done by all who wished to retain property or increase it. They could at least bribe the Christian Justices of the Jews, as those officers were entitled who had to decide causes between Jews and Christians, and to enquire what revenue could be extracted from the Jewry. If all property in the hands of the Jews was registered, and if they could not recover by law either the interest or the principal of any debt which could not be proved by reference to the Common Chest, it was manifestly impossible for them to defraud the Government, except by hiding coin or other valuables in their houses. But to put away his talent in a napkin, to let his money lie idle without a hope of increase, would, in the eyes of a Jew, be to dry up the fountain of his riches. His plan, therefore, was bold, simple, and effectual; he gave the Justices as much as was required to secure their support. Thus it became necessary to issue writs of inquisition into the concealments of the Jewry. Thus Philip Lovel was convicted of receiving presents to further the interests of Jews, and Robert de la Hoo of affixing his seal to a forged bond, and both were deprived of the office of Justice.

The Pope's money-changers nevertheless grew gradually richer, and the Jews gradually poorer. In the civil wars of the reign of Henry III. the Jews Their privileges are restricted. fared even worse than the rest of the population, and were robbed and massacred in riot after riot. The Jewry, in the sense of the revenue to be derived from taxes on the Jews, was mortgaged again and again, until at last it was pledged to their rivals the Caursins. With the right of exacting payment was commonly given the right of distraining; and there can be no doubt that during some of the later years of the Jews' sojourn in England many of their goods and of their securities, in the shape of bonds, passed into the hands of the Pope's money-changers. In the year 1270 it was ordained that no Jews should in future possess any freehold in England, except the dwellings which they occupied, or which they let to other Jews in the towns where they had licence to reside. All previous conveyances made to them were to be held null and void, and the lands were to be given back to the Christians who had formerly been in possession, on repayment of the purchase money without interest.

Soon after the accession of Edward I. was enacted the Statute of the Jewry, in which it was recited that many honest men had lost their inheritances through the payment of usury to the Jews, and that many sins had been committed from the same cause. It was therefore ordained, for the honour of God and for the common benefit of the people, that no Jew should in future practise usury. In this it is not difficult to perceive a desire to conciliate the landholders and the townsmen. In another document it is no less easy to detect the influence of the Church. The king was informed that certain Jews were in the habit of blaspheming the Catholic faith, the Crucifix, the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the Sacraments. He considered it his duty to repress such iniquity by virtue of his office as a Catholic prince; and the Justices appointed to investigate crimes affecting the coinage of the realm were commanded to punish all Jews guilty of insults to the Christian faith by death or mutilation. The letter concluded with a command, long desired by the clergy, that every Jewess should wear a badge on the upper garment in the same manner as the male Jews.

We who live in an age in which half-civilised countries still afford instances of attacks upon the Jews, and of absurdly false charges made against them, can, while we congratulate ourselves upon our own

Absurd
accusations
against them.

progress, estimate at their true value some of the accusations made by our forefathers. The Jews of Lincoln, it was said, had stolen a Christian child, hidden it away in one of their houses, fattened it on milk, and then crucified it in mockery of the Christian faith. It was reported that a general invitation had been issued to all the Jews of England, who had journeyed from every city in order that they might be present at the ceremony. A jury of course convicted those Jews who were accused, and they were hanged for an offence which it may be considered certain that they did not commit. At Oxford, one Ascension-day, the Chancellor, the Masters, and the scholars were marching in procession through the streets of the city with the cross borne before them. Suddenly, none knew from whence, a man was seen to throw himself upon the bearer of the holy symbol, to seize it in his hand, to hurl it to the ground, and to trample it in the mire. The surprise was so great that he had escaped before an attempt could be made to capture him, and the consternation was increased by the discovery that the cross was broken. Every one said that the author of this outrage must have been a Jew, and that, if he could not be taken, the community to which he belonged must be made to suffer. The Jews of Oxford were therefore compelled to provide a new cross of silver to replace that which was broken, and to set up a cross of marble as a memorial of the event.

Such were the offences against Holy Church of which the Jews were suspected in the time of Edward I. Whether there was any better foundation for the accusation that they were in the habit of clipping or counterfeiting the coin it is not easy to decide. But the previous convictions of moneyers employed at the authorised mints are at least sufficient to show that the Jews were no worse in this respect than their neighbours. The result, however, of an enquiry into the state of the coinage, in the reign of Edward I., was that two hundred and eighty Jews were hanged in London alone. After this wholesale execution, a great number of persons, who in the records are styled Christians, adopted the profession of informer, and threatened with prosecution those Jews who had never been convicted or even suspected. The object was simply to extort money ; and as conviction was followed by death, the price of silence was high in proportion.

Two hundred and eighty of them hanged in London.

Suspected of every crime, deprived of their synagogues, some of which were converted into Christian churches,

Cruel expulsion of the Jews from the kingdom.

forbidden even to pray after their own fashion within the walls of their own houses, the Jews still lingered a few years in England.

But in the year 1289, the clergy, supported no doubt by the popular feeling both of the townsmen and of the landholders, made a final and successful effort to banish the infidels from the country—or, as they expressed it, to separate the goats from the sheep. The Exchequer had ceased to draw a considerable income from the Jewry. The king had less control over the revenue than his predecessors, and had therefore but little interest in opposing the general wish, and he was persuaded to name a day, after which no Jew was to be found in England on pain of death. Cruel as such an edict would be at any time, it was doubly cruel when there was hardly a country in Europe in which the exiles could seek refuge. The Jews had already been expelled from France as they were now expelled from England, and there was no Christian nation which would clothe the naked and feed the hungry when the hungry and the naked were Israelites. But the order had gone forth that the Israelites were to depart ; there was to be a new Exodus, in which they could not spoil the Egyptians, but must be despoiled in turn.

More than sixteen thousand Jews sailed from England, in the year 1290, in quest of new homes. So sad a banishment as this has never been narrated by historian or conceived by poet. Men who have been driven into exile for political offences have, in all ages, been consoled with political sympathy abroad. Even the Phocæans when they abandoned their hearths were not without hopes of a glorious future. The Jews were compelled to embark on frail vessels with their families and with those moveables which they were allowed to retain. They were at the mercy of seamen who bore them no good will, and who thought it rather a good deed than a crime to injure a Jew. Their most difficult task was not, as the Roman had said of other exiles, to escape from themselves, but to escape from Christians. They were uncertain where they might be permitted to land, and certain only that if they escaped death they were doomed to persecution. Their fate was not very unlike that of the Paterine heretics, whom all true Christians were forbidden to feed, a century earlier, and was hardly less cruel than that of other heretics who were burnt in England a century later.

Both the king and the Church profited by the expulsion of the Jews. The king became master of all their houses and all their debts. The latter he appropriated to satisfy his own needs ; the proceeds of the former he promised that he would devote to pious uses. The Letters Patent by which he granted the houses, the synagogues, and the burial places of the Jews to his Christian subjects are still extant, and show that

Its advantage to the king and the clergy.

the greater portion of the synagogues and burial-grounds, at least, fell into the hands of the clergy. If the Jews possessed any friend in England who would write a letter to them in their exile, they must have suffered a new pang in learning that their cemetery near Cripplegate, where the bones of their ancestors had reposed nearly two hundred years, had been bestowed, as a mere piece of waste land, upon the Dean of St. Paul's.

Whether the monks of Westminster had, in the seventy years which had elapsed since the time of Pandulf and Isaac of Norwich, succeeded in freeing themselves from the debts with which they were burdened, it is now impossible to discover.

Its bearing upon a crime attributed to the Abbot and Monks of Westminster The difficulty of paying off money borrowed from usurers at a high rate of interest is proverbial ; and it is, therefore, by no means improbable that there was still embarrassment in the monastery, and that bonds, in which the corporation was held liable, were still outstanding. When the Jewry began to be impoverished, the Pope's money-changers, and, after them, the Lombard merchants or bankers, must, in the ordinary course of business, have become possessed of many securities previously held by the Jews ; and the clergy, who had disliked the Jews as creditors, complained no less bitterly of their creditors the Caursins. These considerations may, perhaps, afford some explanation of a crime which was attributed to the Abbot and monks of Westminster, a few years after the banishment of the Jews, and in which some members of the House were almost certainly implicated.

Edward I. had not many days left Westminster for a campaign against the Scots. The whole available force of the kingdom was on its march northwards to crush the brave Wallace. In the king's absence there was no body-guard at the Palace ; every soldier who could be spared was in active service in the field. On the twenty-sixth of April, and succeeding days, great numbers of precious stones, and all kinds of gold-work and silver-work were offered for sale to the goldsmiths of London, and bought by them with a readiness which did them no credit. A rumour soon travelled from mouth to mouth that the Royal Treasury, which was within the Abbey, but close to the Palace at Westminster, had been entered and robbed. Nearly all its contents had been carried off, and some of them had been found in the burial-ground near the Abbey. The loss to the king was afterwards declared to have been no less than a hundred thousand pounds. It is not easy to state the modern equivalent of such a sum ; but materials for an estimate may be found in the fact that the whole revenue of the kingdom amounted to no more than forty thousand pounds about thirty years before the time of the robbery, and that the customs of the chief ports of England were farmed to a company of foreign merchants, about thirty years later, for an annual payment, not exceeding eight thousand pounds.

The Great
Robbery at the Royal Treasury.

The king was in Scotland when his loss was announced to him, and it was not until the sixth of June, when he was at Linlithgow, that he found an opportunity to appoint a commission of enquiry.

Commission of Enquiry.

The mode of proceeding is a curious illustration of the ancient jury-system, in which there was no distinction between jurors and witnesses. A jury was empanelled for every ward of the city of London, and for every hundred of Middlesex and Surrey—and in addition to these there was a jury of goldsmiths and a jury of aldermen. The separate findings of the juries are the sum of the evidence in the case. On the chief points there was a remarkable agreement in the verdicts ; on others, the jurors of some of the hundreds were silent. It was not disputed that access had been gained to the Treasury from within the walls of the Abbey, that an aperture had been made in the solid masonry for the purpose, and that the person most actively concerned was one Richard Podelicote, who was described as a travelling merchant. Some of the juries found that he had the assistance of masons and carpenters, and most of them, including the aldermen, that he was instigated by certain of the monks, who had planned the whole scheme. The Sacristan of the Abbey had, according to some accounts, offered a portion of the jewels to a girl to induce her to become his mistress. He and the Sub-prior had, according to the aldermen and other jurors, been the principal framers of the design. The Sub-prior, too, had been seen by the Keeper of the Palace in the very act of carrying off some of the spoil.

Abbot and monks were alike under grave suspicion when these facts were brought to light. The Sacristan,

Indictment and Trial of the Sacristan
and Monks. Sub-prior, and others were imprisoned in the Tower. The Abbot, however, was held to bail.

A petition was then sent to the king, in which it was represented that the abbot and monks and other persons accused were innocent, and that they were suffering great injustice in being detained in the Tower. Though the abbot was really in the enjoyment of freedom, the king's sympathy was, perhaps, excited by the picture of an abbot and all his monks confined on a charge of robbery. But whether this was so or not, he lost no time in appointing justices to hear and determine the case.

Juries were summoned from the various hundreds and wards, as in the preliminary enquiry, and their recorded verdicts were in all material points identical with those of their predecessors. The correctness of their finding was to a great extent confirmed by the subsequent confession of Podelicote. He did not directly implicate any one except himself, but he admitted that he had been at work upon the wall, through which the Treasury had been entered, night after night, from the seventeenth of December to the twenty-fourth of April. On the night of the twenty-fourth he succeeded in making his way through. He spent the whole of the twenty-fifth in the Treasury, and occupied himself during the day in selecting jewels. In the course of the following night the treasure was carried away,

It is quite evident that an enterprise which required more than four months for its accomplishment could not have been successful had there been no collusion within the Abbey-gates. The findings of the various juries point to a deep-laid conspiracy between some persons in the Abbey and others in the neighbouring Palace. There was a path from one to the other which was frequented up to a certain hour in the evening, after which the gates were closed and no one could pass. It was remembered, when the robbery had been committed, that these gates had for some time previously been closed at an earlier hour than usual. This could hardly have been done without the consent of persons in authority in both buildings, and the object was obviously to give Podelicote an opportunity of working without fear of interruption. It is not, indeed, clear that the abbot was cognisant of what was done by his monks, or that the keeper of the Palace connived at what was the monks before and after conviction.

Conduct of

done by his subordinates. It is, however, quite certain that, after all the accomplices had been paid, the booty would have been sufficient to pay even such a debt as might have been due on a bond transferred from the Jews to other merchants or money-changers. It is also quite certain that charters were commonly forged in religious houses, and that when the fraud was detected the abbot did not commonly suffer. There is, therefore, no antecedent improbability in the supposition that this audacious crime of the fourteenth century was planned by those who would not have hesitated to secure land for their House by means of a false deed. So, no doubt, thought the judges, who sentenced some laymen, against whom verdicts were found, to be hanged, and detained the convicted monks in prison more than two years. The monkish writers exclaim loudly against the iniquity of the Justices, but adduce not a particle of evidence to show that the juries were deceived, and do not even accuse them of taking a false oath. Nor is it even denied by these partial historians that the abbot and monks of Westminster were guardians of the treasure which was stored within their walls. Nevertheless, when the king returned in triumph from Scotland, the Church had sufficient influence to procure the liberation of the monks—partly, no doubt, in celebration of his victories. But this act of clemency seems to have had indirectly the effect of increasing the suspicion against all the inmates of the monastery. An irreconcilable discord arose between the abbot and his monks; charges and counter-charges were made; words were uttered and acts were done which the monkish chronicler describes as too paltry for repetition; and the king, the nobility, and the members of other religious houses were utterly disgusted at the scandal to religion.

It is only in the inner life of the nation—in the life which lies beneath pomp and pageantry and ceremony—that progress can be measured, only by the readiness with which laws are obeyed that the success of legislation can be fairly appreciated. Contrast between the improvements in the laws and the lawlessness of the people. During this period, when the towns were beginning to enjoy their civic organisation according to charter, when the assertion of rival interests was developing, as it were, by a happy chance, the English constitution, when commerce was feebly groping its way to the light in the midst of such dark deeds as the oppression and expulsion of its best friends, the Jews, the criminal law was undergoing a change wholly out of proportion to any change effected in the manners of the people. The only conclusion to be drawn from this strange contrast is that the general tone of society is at any time a stronger force than the provisions of the most brilliant law-giver, though, of course, as his thoughts are made known to the masses, he may in the end improve the general tone. In proportion as education is more widely diffused, the good effects are more easily produced; but, when barbarism has held its own for centuries, a mere improvement in criminal procedure long remains little more than an improvement in writing. How much progress there was in the law, a slight sketch will suffice to show; how little progress there was in refinement may be made apparent by some of the deeds done in the period between the Third Crusade and the Black Death, and still more by a picture of England as it was in the year before that terrible plague.

We have seen what was the trial by ordeal in the dreary age which preceded the Conquest; we have seen what was the action of the Church in persecuting heretics and Jews; the beneficent influence of the Church in abolishing the ordeal yet remains to be told. Soon after the establishment of the Norman rule, the ancient practice of conducting the ceremony within the walls of a church was abandoned. The scene of 'God's Judgment' was removed to a trench or pit, and numerous entries on rolls of the reign of Henry II. refer to payments made for the preparation of the pits, and the consecration of the apparatus. The ordeal by water still continued to be the more common, though in the reign of John a number of persons of ill repute were allowed the alternative of the water or of 'carrying the iron.' The exclusion of the hot water and the hot iron from churches was, however, but the prelude to their exclusion from the office of detecting guilt by order of the Church. By a decree of the Lateran Council in the year 1215 the ordeal was forbidden, and in the year 1219 it was formally abolished in England; and there is no doubt that to the clergy is due the credit of putting an end to this particular form of barbarism.

As compurgation in cases of felony was now no longer permitted, except in some privileged towns and in ecclesiastical jurisdictions, the abolition of the ordeal left the accused without any means of exculpation except the duel. This does not seem to have been repugnant to the ecclesiastical opinion of the time, and the wager of battle was yet to remain an established institution during many long ages. It was in use as a form of trial for civil no less than for criminal abolished through the influence of the Church.

The Ordeal

The judicial duel: an instance.

matters, and it was applied even to such a purpose as the decision of the right to an advowson. A case, indeed, in which an advowson was in dispute affords a better insight into the nature of the judicial duel than any other which a laborious search has brought to light. Outside the walls of Northampton a plot of ground was marked out for the trial, and was kept by soldiers. The Justices in Eyre sat as they would have sat in a grand assise or in an assise of novel disseisin. The parties to the suit appeared, as was the law in civil cases, not in person, but each by champion. A great crowd surrounded the field of battle, or court of law, but the partisans on one side were in far greater number than those on the other. After the signal had been given, the combatants began to struggle, each bound to conquer or die, or to bear for ever afterwards the most disgraceful of all names—recreant. At length both fell at the same moment. The friends of the deforciant, fearing that the issue might be adverse to them, drew their swords, broke through the line of soldiers, and surrounded the two fallen men. Some were mounted, others on foot, and the force at the disposal of the judges was wholly unable to cope with them. They held the ground and kept off both the soldiers and the justices. The champion of the plaintiffs was unable to raise himself, the horses were made to trample upon him, and when he was quite helpless he was proclaimed a recreant. The sheriff raised the hue and cry, and the judges left the ground, without any attempt to bring the proceedings to a legal termination. A complaint was afterwards laid before the king in council, when it was held that the attack upon the justices and the champion tended to the subversion of the royal dignity, peace, and crown, and that the champion should not incur the infamy and the disabilities of recreancy, but should enjoy his free law as fully as before the duel.

To such a trial alone, subject to such interruptions, could a person accused of felony be brought, after the abolition of the ordeal; and even this method of testing the truth or falsehood of a charge could not be applied unless the accusation was made by an individual as distinguished from the 'country' or the jury of the hundred. It was at this time that a form of proceeding which was developed into our modern trial by petty jury crept into the place left vacant by the hot iron and the hot water. The presentment made by the jury of the hundred was no more than the story of a body of accusers, which was commonly denied by the person accused. The judges soon discovered that unless some other means of arriving at the truth could be found, either every indictment would be equivalent to a conviction, or every criminal would escape through the want of some final process by which he might be tried. They therefore enquired of each juror of the twelve who had presented the charge upon what information he believed it. They also asked the accused whether he suspected any juror of malice, and removed those to whom he objected. It often happened that eleven of the jurors had taken the word of the twelfth for the facts, and that the twelfth, when closely pressed, could not assign any reasonable ground for his statements. After this examination, and, when necessary, the substitution of unchallenged for challenged jurors, the jury, which might still consist entirely of the men who had preferred the indictment, found a second verdict which decided the fate of the prisoner. This was a step made at once towards our modern system of examining and cross-examining witnesses, and towards the creation of a second jury to consider the charge of the first. As soon as this second verdict had become a recognised stage of the criminal proceedings instituted 'by the country,' it naturally suggested an alternative for the duel in prosecutions instituted by individuals. Thus it became the custom to ask the accused in what manner he would be tried, and thus arose the form of answer—'by my country.' The jury in this case, though chosen in precisely the same manner as the jury which made indictments, or as we should now say, the grand jury, yet gave a final verdict upon a particular case in the same manner as the modern petty jury. But when the precedent had once been set, when once a jury had been summoned for the simple purpose of deciding the guilt or innocence of a particular prisoner, it was inevitable that a distinction should sooner or later be drawn between the jury which accused and the jury which tried—that where an indictment was preferred the final decision should sooner or later be by the verdict of a second jury, not by a second verdict of the first.

The Petty Jury taking the place of the Ordeal, and, in part, of the Duel.

In the reign of Edward I. some progress had been made towards the division, into two classes, of the juries summoned to give verdicts upon criminal affairs. Nothing could better illustrate the practice of the time than the proceedings which followed the great robbery at the Treasury. The juries of the various hundreds and wards, summoned in obedience to a special commission, found that certain persons were implicated in the crime. After the indictment, five justices, of whom only two had been engaged in the preliminary investigation, were directed to try the prisoners. Juries were summoned from the same hundreds and wards as before, but in obedience to a different commission. There was only one reason why the individual jurors who sat upon the second occasion should not have been in every instance men who had not sat upon the first. The existence of each of the first set of juries, taken as a whole, had as much come to an end after the committal of the monks to the Tower as the existence of a grand jury which sat at the Old Bailey ten years ago has come to an end at the present moment. But as the first set of juries were expected to give a verdict according to their own knowledge, so also were the second. In both cases the jurors were witnesses ; and, unless disqualified by their conduct in the first stage of the proceedings, they would be required to repeat their evidence in a final verdict. Thus, though the abolition of ordeal caused in a very short time a formal separation of the trying jury from the accusing jury, the whole system of trial was, so far as criminal affairs were concerned, long afterwards vitiated by the inherent defect which allowed the same person to exercise at once the functions of prosecutor, of witness, and of judge. It cannot, indeed, be shown with any certainty that, even in civil causes, witnesses distinct from the jurors were examined in court before the time of Henry VI.; and centuries afterwards the jurors were, in theory at least, supposed to have been summoned because their testimony was of value upon matters of fact.

In the next chapter it will be shown that when convictions were obtained, they followed almost always upon indictments, and hardly ever upon appeals—Indictments and Appeals: Party-swearing. which were accusations made by individuals. For this there were many reasons. One was that when jurors had in the first instance given an accusatory verdict, they could not afterwards give a verdict of acquittal without imminent danger of a prosecution for perjury. Another was that the old habit of fellowship in swearing had contributed not a little to the growth of trial by jury. If the reeve and thanes accused a man, before the Conquest, his friends made a party to swear that he was innocent; if a private person was the accuser, his oath also was supported by those of his friends. Though these ancient institutions had gone through many changes, there was still sufficient resemblance to the old forms for the old spirit of party-swearing to continue in full vigour. Though the indictment was a species of compromise between the accusation by reeve and thanes and the accusation by the oaths of a fixed number of private persons, the obligation to injure as much as possible the adversary of a friend was considered as binding as ever; and if it would not ensure a conviction, there was no motive which would. On the other hand, compurgation, though no longer a part of the common law of the land, was by no means forgotten. The recollection of it was kept alive by the wager of law which, though now applicable only to minor trespasses, was identical with the ancient mode of escaping punishment for great offences. In appeals, in cases in which a charge was made by one person against another, the juror who, it must be remembered, had taken no part in the accusation, could hardly fail to look upon himself in the light of a compurgator. His simple reasoning would be that he must be on one side or other, that he was not on the side of the prosecutor, and that he must therefore be necessarily on the side of the prisoner. He had probably acted often enough as one of the 'hands' in the wager of law, and it must have been impossible, in an age of such dense ignorance, to make him see, in an appeal of rape or murder, that he was not simply one of the 'hands' whose office it was to swear, without hesitation, that the person appealed was innocent.

In the confusion which followed upon the abolition of the ordeal the judges seem to have been thrown into some perplexity by the refusal of prisoners to submit themselves to any kind of trial. In the reign of John an accused person who 'went to' the fire or water, and failed to clear himself, was hanged. Only two years after these tests had ceased to be applied in England, some criminals made the experiment of standing mute when brought before the justices, and their fate was precisely what it would previously have been if they had been convicted by the 'Judgment of God.' Early in the reign of Edward I. a number of malefactors were surrounded and attacked by the Sheriff of Yorkshire. Some were killed in the struggle, some were made prisoners, and some were beheaded on the spot, because they would not consent to be tried 'according to the law and custom of the realm.' This, however, does not appear to have been considered satisfactory, for a year or two later, a statute was passed to the effect that when notorious felons were accused at the king's suit, and refused to stand to the law, they should be sent to the 'prison forte et dure.' About the reign of Henry IV. the 'prison forte et dure' was transformed into the 'peine forte et dure,' or torture of the press, which was not indicated in the Statute of Edward I., and did not for many generations form a portion of the judgment pronounced upon mute persons. Before the additional horror was inflicted, to be adjudged to the 'prison forte et dure,' was to be adjudged to penance and perpetual mute : the 'prison forte et dure.'

Standing

imprisonment; but the penance was confinement in a narrow cell and absolute starvation. The gaolers, however, when their prisoners were their friends, found in the credulity of the age a ready aid to their friendship; and it is possible that some distrust of their fidelity may have suggested the hideous cruelty by which an attempt was afterwards made to draw speech from the silent. A pardon granted by Edward III. shows with sufficient clearness both what was the intention of the law with respect to those who would not plead, and how it was sometimes thwarted. 'The King to all his bailiffs and faithful men to whom these presents shall come, Greeting. Whereas Cecilia, widow of John Rygeaway, lately indicted concerning the death of her husband, was adjudged to her penance because she held herself mute before our Justices of Gaol delivery at Nottingham; and whereas she afterwards sustained life without food or drink, in close prison, during forty days, after the manner of a miracle, and contrary to human nature, as we have been informed on trustworthy testimony; We, moved by piety, to the praise of God, and of the glorious Virgin his mother, from whom, as is believed, this miracle has proceeded, have of our special grace pardoned unto the same Cecilia the execution of the judgment aforesaid, and do desire that she be delivered from prison and be no further impeached of her body.'

Though it may be said that the abolition of ordeal led indirectly, after many generations, to the institution of the torture by press, it seems nevertheless to have had collateral effects which more than ^{Effects of the punishment of mutilation.} compensated for this perpetuation of barbarism in a new form. The horrible punishment of mutilation which was characteristic of the centuries immediately preceding the Conquest and had been adopted into the laws of the Conqueror, as best fitted to impress the native mind, gradually became extinct. The brutalising effect which it had had upon the whole population can hardly be conceived in the modern age of refinement. In the midst of the general lawlessness every man was, when he had the power, a law unto himself, and inflicted upon his enemy the punishment which the law of the land destined for the evil doer. Maiming, that is to say, depriving a human being of a member, was consequently one of the commonest of offences—for which the law provided a wholly inadequate remedy in the appeal of maihem. The subject can hardly be better illustrated than by an act which has been recorded among the rolls of the Court of King's Bench. One Guy Mortimer was rector of the church of Kingston-on-Hull. He bore some grudge against William Joye, one of his parishioners, whom he instructed another clergyman and some of his followers to attack. When the man was prostrate and helpless, Guy appeared, drew a knife, and with his own hand deliberately cut off the upper lip of his enemy. The sufferer estimated his loss at a hundred pounds—a considerable sum in those times—and instituted a suit. The two chief offenders appeared in court, but maintained that as they were clerks they were not bound to answer, and persistently refused to answer in the absence of their Ordinary. The court, however, held that this was a case in which no Benefit of Clergy could be claimed—not indeed, because the offence was too heinous, but because it was a mere trespass and no felony. Judgment was accordingly given against the rector and his assistant, who were each required to pay a hundred pounds, and were committed to prison until they should have satisfied the complainant and the king. The deed which Guy Mortimer had done was simply one of the deeds familiar to the executioner from time immemorial, and familiar in its results to all Englishmen who, if they were not thoroughly accustomed to see lipless criminals, had heard many a time of the sights seen by their fathers.

An illustration.

It was, however, one of the most agreeable features of the age that such acts were ceasing to have the sanction of the law, and were reserved for occasions in which it seemed expedient to execute a more than ordinarily impressive sentence. It was, as the laws of the Conqueror show, considered more merciful to hang than to cut off an important member, and to this extent justice had grown more humane towards thieves. Even in the reign of Edward III. the ancient terrors were brought to bear upon the too prevalent habit of brawling in court. A tailor of London was convicted of this act of contempt, of which he had been guilty in the presence not only of the justices, but of the king himself at Westminster. He was condemned to imprisonment in the Tower of London for life, and to the loss of his right hand. He had, however, the good fortune to be pardoned ; and the rolls of Gaol Delivery of this period show conclusively that the ordinary punishments were hanging, the pillory, and the tumbrel or dung cart.

Gradual substitution of other punishments.

There is so close a connexion between the disuse of mutilation as punishment and the mitigation of the Forest Laws that the consideration of the one naturally suggests the consideration of the other. It will be remembered that, before the Conquest, certain lands were known as folc-land or people's land, which was, perhaps, unenclosed, even during the Roman occupation, and that certain common rights existed on portions even of those lands which were afterwards designated manors. The wood-lands had been regarded by the invading Teutons in nearly the same light in which the American Indians used to regard their hunting-grounds. Tribes, to which cities were an abomination, had advanced but very little beyond that view of life according to which the whole world is a free forest, where the first comer may take whatever he can find. Other notions concerning property were with difficulty fostered in the towns ; princes and kings, though recognised as the heads of their clans, were long before they could impress upon their followers that they ought to enjoy any exclusive rights over the haunts of the partridge, the hare, or the deer. Traditions, handed down from the time when land was held in common, found their expression in attacks on parks, and chaces, and in the life of the forest brigand many a century after the Conquest. They survive, even now, in the sympathy often enjoyed by poachers, and in the antipathy often shown to the game-laws. But long before the Norman Conquest private individuals had asserted their exclusive rights to hunting over their own woods and fields, and king Canute had issued an impressive warning to trespassers upon the royal forests which were probably a part of the folc-land. Under the Conqueror the folc-land became in name, as it was already in fact, the king's land, over which the forest laws were exercised with a rigour often described as execrable. The truth, however, seems to be that if any change was really effected in this respect under our first three kings of the French line, it was only a part of that vigilant severity which pervaded the administration of other laws and was necessary for the security of foreign invaders. The forest courts or moots have both in their names and in their mode of operation the marks of an age anterior to that of William I. The policy of devastating whole tracts of country, which afterwards became forest land, was suggested, in part, at least, by military considerations. The doctrine, that hunting was a royal privilege to be enjoyed of right by the king alone, and to be granted to subjects only as a favour, was no more than an expression, in another shape, of the doctrine that the king was the superior lord of all land. It was, at most, only feudalism in a more systematic form than had been previously known. No new punishment was introduced, and if men lost life or limb for killing or stealing a deer they had long before been horribly mutilated for thefts as petty, and, probably enough, for the very same offence.

The Forest Laws.

When, however, mutilation ceased to be a punishment in common use it ceased to add horror to the administration of the forest laws. By the Forest Charter of Henry III. it was provided that for the ^{Mitigation of them.} future no one should lose life or member for the king's venison. Any one detected in taking it was to pay a heavy fine, or to be imprisoned for a year and a day, and after that time to find sureties for future good behaviour. If none would be responsible for him when his term of imprisonment expired, he was compelled to abjure the realm. The penalty was still out of all proportion to the offence, but it had ceased to be disgracefully brutal; and the only remnant of sheer cruelty which was left in the forest laws after this time, was the practice of mutilating dogs.

The diminished frequency of the more brutal forms of punishment had, no doubt, sooner or later an effect upon the national character ; but no greater error can be committed by statesman or historian than is involved in the supposition that manners, customs, and sentiments, handed down from generation to generation, can be suddenly altered by the promulgation of a law. The true history of a nation is not so much a history of the laws which have been made for its governance as a history of the motives which have guided the individuals composing it. Laws are nothing unless they are obeyed, and they are worth little unless obeyed in the spirit as well as in the letter. When they are far above the level of popular feeling they are practically valueless; when they descend low enough to lift a population by easy stages to higher views they attain their greatest value. The gradual withdrawal of legal sanction from the practice of mutilation was one of those happy reforms which imperceptibly improve the moral tone of a people, and which are not followed by less important results because little is expected from them. The cruelty inherited from ages of barbarism could not be eradicated in a year or a century ; but when the subtle influence of a bad example was removed there was a clearer field for the operation of more favourable causes at a future time. It was long, indeed, before that time came. Burning at one period took the place occupied by chopping at another ; but there were not so many stakes for heretics as there had been amputating instruments for thieves ; and human tenderness was not quite so effectually blunted by the occasional execution of Lollards as by the ever-recurring sight of men rendered cripples according to law. The whole history of crime tells how slow was the progress towards a sympathy with human suffering, but it tells also that progress was made,

Slow effects of legislation upon the tone of society.

and bids us not to despair when we find some new enactment apparently useless, nor to form hasty theories concerning any subjects of our empire, when we fail to effect a miracle by the magic of a statute.

We, who have long enjoyed the blessings of a settled government, can only with the greatest difficulty throw ourselves, in imagination, back into a period when a settled government was as little expected by Englishmen as Shakspeare expected, when his Puck bragged of putting a girdle round about the earth in forty minutes, that a girdle would one day convey a message round the earth in forty seconds. In that reciprocal action which makes a cause appear to be sometimes an effect, and an effect at other times a cause, it is not easy to discover at what point a greater willingness to obey laws produces a more settled government, or at what point a more settled government produces a greater tendency to obey laws. Men's interests are the prime movers of their actions ; and, as commerce and education enlarge their views, they perceive that their true interests, no matter what their class, are best advanced by well established laws peacefully obeyed. But there was no such enlightenment in the troubled times of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries ; and it is but too evident that barons then excited commotions in order to become individually their own lawgivers, and that the compromises which they effected with kings became recognised at last as constitutional principles. The Manor Court, which still possesses vitality, is a memorial of a time when a baron possessed a prison, into which he could throw 'hand-having' or 'back-bearing' thieves before he hanged them, when he took advantage of a civil war to seize his neighbour's goods on pretext of distraining by virtue of his own jurisdiction, and when his chief object in opposing the king's authority was that he might be a little king himself. A statute which restricts these privileges by no means implies a state of society in which they are restricted; nor does the abolition of a needlessly cruel punishment render men at once averse to needless cruelty. If consonant with the tone of the age a good statute effects in time a proportionate good; but it is not now an immediate panacea for all evils, and still less was it such a panacea before the Black Death. The laws, indeed, of that early period which at first sight appear to mark the truest advance were but a bitter mockery of the every-day life of an Englishman.

In a writ for the Conservation of the Peace bearing the date 1233, may be seen an attempt to develop and enforce the ancient system of police which had existed before the Conquest. It will be remembered that there was a certain apparent completeness in this system even in the tenth and eleventh centuries. The mutual responsibility of the Peace Pledge seemed to find all that was required to render it effectual in the watch and ward provided for the highways and within the town walls. Its real use, as amended under Henry III., was only that of handing down to posterity a summary of the inconveniences to which our forefathers were subjected by futile attempts to give a little security to their lives and property. Any stranger attempting to pass through any town at night was to be arrested and kept under guard until the next morning; if he escaped he was to be followed with hue and cry. No one was to entertain a stranger within his house more than one night, except on condition of finding sureties and incurring the same responsibility as for a member of his own

Provisions for the Conservation of the Peace.

household. All who possessed private jurisdictions were to be answerable to the Justices in Eyre for any neglect of these provisions. The sheriffs and foresters were to use all diligence in attempting to preserve the peace, and, if they heard that malefactors made any wood a place of shelter, they were to summon the whole neighbourhood to aid in effecting a capture. The sheriffs or their bailiffs were to receive into their custody any malefactor taken by a private person, and were not to exact a fee for the performance of this duty. * Any one unknown, and found travelling with arms, was to be lodged in gaol until he could produce sureties for his good behaviour; and in the same manner all found in possession of property of which they could not give a satisfactory account were to be imprisoned for a year and a day, and if they were then unable to produce sureties they were to abjure the realm.

Similar provisions are repeated in the year 1253, when the armed watch at every gate of every town is somewhat more minutely described, and when the connection between the old system of police and the assise of arms is rendered more apparent. All the males, between the ages of fifteen and sixty, in town and in country, are to be 'sworn to arms'—all, that is to say, are to prove that they possess arms of the kind suited to their condition of life. All are to be ready, when called upon, to take part in the hue and cry, and to aid in the capture of malefactors; none are to carry their arms except when specially summoned to preserve the peace. In these regulations we see that every man was under the obligation of military service, as in the old days before the Conquest, and that military service implied police duties in time of peace as well as field duties in time of war. It seems, too, that a merchant or other traveller could claim an escort from the mayor and bailiffs of any city or borough, if he chose to show that he had a considerable sum of money in his possession.

In the famous statute of Winchester (A.D. 1285) the ancient law with respect to watch and ward, to hue and cry, and to the assise of arms, was again declared. The Statute of Winchester. Some further provisions, however, were added. A space of two hundred feet was to be cleared of all bushes on either side of every highway, and there were to be no dykes within the same distance, in which malefactors could lurk. The whole hundred, with the franchises which might be included in it, was to be answerable for every robbery committed within its limits, as it was already answerable for the murder of all persons who were not English. The meaning of this was that the hundred must either produce the offenders and indict them, or pay a fine. The reason for making the neighbourhood responsible was plainly enough expressed in the statute, and will not excite any surprise in those who have followed the course of our criminal law from the days of the peace-guild and of compurgation. Felons, according to the preamble, could not be convicted by the oath of jurors, who would rather that strangers should be robbed with impunity than that their own neighbours should be indicted either as robbers or as receivers. Perjury, in short, was not in popular estimation considered a crime; and it appears from another statute, not less famous than that of Winchester, that Englishmen had in the reign of Edward I. as little hesitation in swearing falsely to deprive a man of his land as to screen a brother brigand from punishment.

With the attempt to render the ancient system of police effective was combined a change in the method of administering justice. After Magna Carta, in which it was provided that Common Pleas should not follow the king's person, the King's Court branched out gradually into the Courts of King's Bench, of Common Bench or Common Pleas, and of Exchequer, which three Courts, however, did not absorb quite the whole of the functions of the original stem. The Justices in Eyre continued their circuits, but in the reign of Edward I. the commissions by virtue of which they sat began to be more clearly defined. In this reign the distinction between the Commission of Nisi Prius or Assise and the Commission of Oyer and Terminer was well marked, and Justices of Assise became also Justices of Gaol Delivery. In the first year of the reign of Edward III. good and lawful men in each county were appointed to keep and maintain the peace; and our modern Justices of the Peace seem to have been developed out of these ancient guardians. In short, nearly the whole of the machinery by which justice is administered in the present day was, nominally at least, in existence early in the reign of Edward III.

The difficulty of repressing crime, however, caused some fluctuations in the criminal law, especially with respect to the issue of Commissions of Enquiry and of Oyer and Terminer. The assignment of special Justices to enquire what persons had committed offences of special magnitude, or to try offenders mentioned by name, begins early in the reign of Edward I.; and the practice is continued long afterwards—sometimes in the appointment of Justices of Trailbaston, sometimes in the appointment of Justices who, if not so designated, had the functions of the Justices of Trailbaston. Trailbaston seems to have been a term for which brigandage is the nearest modern equivalent—to have designated the crimes perpetrated by armed bands which either had a fixed rallying-point or wandered about from county to county, murdering, pillaging, making prisoners, and setting fire to houses. The extent to which the evil prevailed, even in the comparatively tranquil reign of Edward III., will be described in another chapter. For the present it may suffice to mention that the special commissions were as unpopular as the earlier eyres had been on their first institution. The statutes contain numerous references to abuses, and attempts to provide a remedy. A petition was presented in Parliament on behalf of persons who had been concerned in indicting offenders before the Justices of Trailbaston, and who had obtained convictions. They complained that, after payment of a fine, many of those who had been justly condemned contrived by unfair means to be placed on inquisitions and juries, so as to be avenged on the accusers by means of false accusations. Two years before the Black Death, Parliament advised the king that the peace would be better preserved by Guardians duly selected in each county, than by Justices acting under a Commission of Trailbaston, and strangers to the neighbourhood. The suggestion did not have the immediate effect of abolishing special commissions, but the popular feeling which it indicated led, at a later period, to an increase in the number of these Guardians, to the acquisition by them of the name of Justice, and at length to the transfer into their hands of some powers previously held by the hated Justices of Trailbaston.

The transition of Justices of Trailbaston into mere

Justices of the Peace is well illustrated by the form of the commissions to both. One of the chief offences into which those who acted under special commissions were to enquire was that of carrying arms in time of peace—at fairs and markets, and in the presence of the king's ministers. The Statute of Northampton, passed in the second year of the reign of Edward III., was specially designed to meet this evil, and was usually mentioned in the special commissions. As soon, however, as the Justices of the Peace were regularly appointed according to a definite system, they were commissioned to enforce the observance of the Statute of Northampton, as well as that of Winchester, and, in later times, of others made for the same purpose. Our modern Justices of the Peace, therefore, whose office is now practically little more than honorary, are the surviving monuments of a time when England was in a state of brigandage, which the people at large were not very anxious to suppress.

It may perhaps seem strange that, when kings and their advisers were striving, generation after generation, to prevent infractions of the peace, there was no well-understood definition of the crime of treason The Law of Treason. before the passing of the Statute of Treasons, in the reign of Edward III. There were previously, no doubt, some vague maxims on the subject, to which the statute gave fixity and precision ; but, when the position both of the king and of the national assembly was ill-defined, it was impossible that crimes against the governing powers could be classified with accuracy. Much has been written by lawyers and by historians to show, on the one hand, that strict hereditary succession to the crown has been the law from time immemorial, and, on the other hand, that the council of the nation, by whatever name known, always had the right of electing and deposing kings. To those who have considered the manner in which our forefathers actually passed their lives it will appear idle to speak either of an original right of succession, in the abstract, or of an original right of election. In accordance with the regard paid to the family tie, even among the most barbarous tribes, the custom arose that the son might, if he could, hold what his father had held before him. It was a custom which was naturally applied to the throne, as well as to a house or land. But men who have no knowledge of letters are not governed by abstract ideas, and deal with each matter according to the means at their disposal and the impulse of the moment. The king who showed signs of weakness was an object of attack ; and if he was dethroned, it was not by virtue of any fundamental principle in the old English constitution, but simply because the party of his enemies happened to be stronger than his own.

The absence of definite legal maxims, and the attempt to give the proceedings of a strong party a colour of legality, are both conspicuous in the treatment of Piers Gavaston, the favourite of Edward II. He was not accused of treason, or of Lèse Majesté, which was the earlier name for High Treason of a particular kind, but he was sentenced by Parliament to perpetual exile as an open enemy of king and people. The offences which were, in the aggregate, construed as overt hostility, were not individually treasons according to the later statute. Gavaston, as alleged by the stronger faction opposed to him, had given evil counsel to the king, whom he had enticed to do wrong ; had collected all the king's treasure, and removed it out of the kingdom ; had

Illustration
from the case of Piers Gavaston.

assumed to himself the royal power and dignity, by taking oaths from men that they would live and die with himself against all others; had estranged the heart of the king from his lieges; had put away good ministers, and substituted men of his own party; had caused grants of crown lands to be improperly made; had maintained robbers and murderers, for whom he had obtained the king's pardon; had led the king to the seat of war without the consent of the baronage; and had procured blank charters under the great seal, in deceit of the king and to the damage of the crown.

The charges brought against the Despensers, father and son, were substantially the same as those brought against Gavaston. When Gavaston returned to England and fell into the hands of his enemies, he was simply beheaded. The fate of both Despensers was, however, that of traitors, though they did not suffer according to due process of law. Both were drawn and hanged, and the body of the son was beheaded and quartered. The true character of these executions is best illustrated by the events which followed them. The victorious barons conducted themselves simply as victors in a private war. They not only imprisoned the adherents of the Despensers, but carried fire and sword into the lands of their enemies. They acted there precisely as a victorious but uncivilised king would have acted in a hostile country through which he was marching.

The deaths, however, of the Despensers are remarkable because they were brought to pass at a time at which the punishment for High Treason, afterwards fully established by law, first comes prominently into notice. In all the cases of Treason during the reign of Edward II.

of which the records have been preserved, the first object of all concerned—except the accused—was to give horror to the sentence, the last to give fairness to the trial. The proceedings against Andrew Harcla, Earl of Carlisle, are thoroughly characteristic of the age. He was thrown into prison, and the accusation against him was heard in his absence. He had no opportunity of making any answer, and was brought before his judges only to hear their judgment, which the Court, sitting under a special commission, delivered at some length. The concluding sentences are worthy of notice, as they show the grounds upon which a portion of the horrible penalty for treason was justified.

‘The award of the Court is, that for your treason you be drawn, and hanged, and beheaded; that your heart, and bowels, and entrails, whence came your traitorous thoughts, be torn out, and burnt to ashes, and that the ashes be scattered to the winds; that your body be cut into four quarters, and that one of them be hanged upon the Tower of Carlisle, another upon the Tower of Newcastle, a third upon the Bridge of York, and the fourth at Shrewsbury; and that your head be set upon London Bridge, for an example to others that they may never presume to be guilty of such treasons as yours against their liege Lord.’

In those rude times men had of course not arrived at that refinement of doctrine according to which only the sovereign’s advisers are responsible for the misgovernment of the sovereign. It followed, therefore, without any abstract theories of constitutional right, that when a king persisted in a course of action which was injurious to the realm, or which a party sufficiently strong chose to declare injurious,

The punishment for High Treason, and the reason assigned for it.

Treason, and the right to depose a sovereign.

he could be represented as a criminal, and subject to punishment. Parliament, or rather a powerful section of Parliament, in this manner gave a sanction to the deposition of Edward II., when it had been already accomplished in fact by force of arms. The transference of the crown to Edward III. was, indeed, no more and no less constitutional than the execution of Harcla was legal. It came to pass because it was the wish of those who had the might to bring it about. If Parliament decreed that Edward II. should cease to reign, Parliament also decreed that Roger Mortimer should be drawn and hanged as a traitor before he had been heard in his own defence. A later Parliament declared that the latter sentence was illegal, and there is, in fact, no better evidence of legality in the one case than in the other. A long list of charges was drawn up against Roger Mortimer, a long list of charges against Edward II.; but force, not law, was brought to bear against both. If any difference is to be detected in the mode in which the two sets of articles of accusation were compiled, it is, that so far as Mortimer was concerned, they were precise, so far as the King was concerned they were vague. Edward, said the Parliament, had shown himself unable to govern, and had been governed by others who advised him ill, had neglected the affairs of the realm, had lost the kingdom of Scotland and other dominions, had injured Holy Church, had violated his Coronation Oath, and had manifested no disposition to amend his conduct. It may have been true that he had erred in all these points, and there may have been a gain to England when he lost his throne; but he was a prisoner, unable to speak for himself, when his enemies denounced him in Parliament at the instigation of his adulterous wife and her paramour, and it is difficult to regard the end of his reign with more satisfaction than the hideous murder which put an end to his life.

When a sovereign has been declared unfit to rule, and a successor has been appointed by a dominant faction, the partisans of the old king and of the new alike feel themselves entitled to pronounce their enemies traitors. In the fourteenth century there was hardly so much as an attempt to conceal the motive by which the actors on either side were commonly impelled. To succeed was to gain possession of the lands forfeited by unsuccessful opponents. All the executions for treason at the end of the reign of Edward II. and the beginning of the reign of Edward III. were followed by a redistribution of property.

Mortimer, who was the chief agent in deposing Edward II., the husband of his paramour, the queen, basely deceived the Earl of Kent, whom he assured that the deposed king was still alive and a prisoner. The object was to gain what the Earl would lose by attainder following upon rebellion. The Earl, who was brother of King Edward II., and uncle of King Edward III., resolved to strike a blow for the release of the supposed captive. Before finally committing himself, however, to so desperate an undertaking, he attempted to ascertain whether Mortimer's statement was true or false. The superstition of the age suggested to him an infallible test. A certain friar was believed to have the power of summoning spirits, who would answer truly any question put to them. The Earl was made to believe that a demon had appeared, and had announced that Edward II. was still alive. It is not certain whether the friar was in collusion with Mortimer or simply gave the answer which he thought would be most agreeable to

Accusations
of treason
from corrupt motives.

Illustration :
the Earl, the Friar, and the Spirit.

the Earl. The result, however, was, that an insurrection was planned, and that the Earl was condemned and executed as a traitor. The story of the Spirit and the Friar, as related by the Earl himself, was thought worthy of special mention in a letter written by Edward III., in which the Pope was earnestly requested not to accept as true any other versions of the affair.

At a time when men hoped to rise by treason and by false accusations of treason, it will be readily believed that the other paths by which wealth was sought were not commonly the paths of honour. Commissions to enquire concerning the wrongs done by government officials, abundant during many centuries, are specially abundant during the long and comparatively tranquil reign of Edward III. Under him greater efforts were made than had ever been made before to improve not so much the laws as the manner in which the laws were administered. Various expedients were tried, but the most comprehensive scheme was put into execution in the fourteenth year of his reign. Commissioners were appointed to investigate all manner of oppressions, wrongs, damages, and grievances charged against all persons holding office, or their subordinates. Not even the Justices of either Bench, nor the Barons of the Exchequer, were exempt from the enquiry, which applied to justices of every description. Escheators, sheriffs, coroners, admirals of fleets, constables of castles, foresters, gaolers, arrayers of the forces, archdeacons, deans, the heads of various departments of the Exchequer, and numbers of inferior officials were mentioned in the commission, the scope of which was to ascertain what hardships, and of what character, had been inflicted upon the people throughout England.
Spread of corruption: attempts to stay it.

This gigantic project may be compared with one of the labours of Hercules. It was an attempt, by no means successful, to cleanse away a foulness greater than mythology has attributed to the Augean stables. Yet one important result appears to have followed it. The corruption of the judges was no longer, if indeed it had been previously, a matter of doubt ; and a serious effort was made soon afterwards to check it by means of the famous Ordinance and Oath of the Justices. By the Ordinance it was provided that the justices should thenceforth administer equal law and execution of right to all the king's subjects, rich and poor, without respect of persons, and without regard to letters or instructions from the king, or from any one. They were to make oath that they would act in accordance with the terms of the Ordinance, and that they would not take, either directly or indirectly, either in private or in public, from any one having plea or process pending before them, any gift or reward of gold, or of silver, or of anything whatsoever, except meat and drink and those of little value, and that they would not accept robe or fee from any one but the king so long as they should hold the office of justice. In order to recompense them for the sacrifice thus demanded of them, it was further ordained by the King and Council that their fees should be increased to such a degree as ought reasonably to be held sufficient by them.

This Ordinance was the last of any importance made in the period embraced by the present chapter. Its provisions reveal to some extent the partialities of which the Justices had previously been guilty, and, from the manner in which reference is made to the future, have the effect of condoning all that had been done in the past. Three years after this most wholesome attempt to reform the administration of the law, society was thrown into utter confusion by the horrors of the Black Death. But meanwhile there was a sufficient opportunity of testing the new system; and the year before the Plague is consequently a time at which the real character of the age may be seen in its most favourable aspect. To show from copious and unimpeachable evidence, and in full detail, what kind of life our forefathers were then passing, is the object of the following chapter.

CHAPTER IV.

ENGLAND IN THE YEAR BEFORE THE BLACK DEATH.

A FOREIGNER visiting England in the year 1348 would have landed most probably at Dover, where men of many nations and of all ranks were continually meeting. There he would have seen ecclesiastics concealing in their convenient robes forbidden missives from Rome ; traders returning from the Low Countries with profits in base money, out of which they hoped to make profits still greater ; captains bragging loudly of their deeds at Calais, which the English had just taken ; adventurers intending to settle in the town from which the French had been expelled ; widows bound on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and attended each by a chaplain and two stout yeomen.

Scene at Dover.

One of the first objects, however, which would have met the traveller's eye, when he set foot on English soil, would have been a group of murderers and robbers, who were to be set loose somewhere on the continent of Europe, there to gain their living as best they could. Criminals who had taken sanctuary were permitted to leave it, unmolested, upon making oath before the coroner that they would quit the realm on a given day. Dover was the port most commonly assigned to them, and if they failed to reach it at the appointed time, they forfeited all the privileges of men.

Sanctuary-

abjuration. Unless, therefore, they joined some band of brigands or were murdered on the way, they, no doubt, presented themselves for embarkation, in strict accordance with the coroner's order. Thus the stranger might, if he pleased, and if he spoke English, have heard from these desperate wayfarers much that he might have desired to know about the condition of the roads in every part of the country. He might have found among them not only some who had travelled from Surrey or Middlesex in three days or four, but some who had travelled from Yorkshire in nine.

Before he quitted Dover he might, if he had been so fortunate as to escape an attack from pirates in his passage across the Channel, have learned something new concerning the manners and customs of the sea-faring population. He would have found there a race of sailors who were too hardy to fear death in any form, and in whom courage took the place of every other virtue. He might have listened to stories in which the peril that had been encountered and survived gave the point to every sentence, and in which the sons were exhorted to dare what their sires and grandsires had dared before them. He would have discovered that the winds and the waves were not the great excitements of life for men who had battled with them from childhood, and that the hand-to-hand struggle with other men was, on sea as on shore, considered to be man's true vocation. He would have been told of great deeds done by the seamen of the Cinque Ports, and especially by the seamen of Dover—how they were a terror to the French and the Flemings—how they were always ready to put off when there was booty to be seized or revenge to be exacted—how they constituted themselves the sole judges in all maritime affairs which affected their district, and sank the ships of their enemies, whether the king had declared war or not. Had he expressed his admiration of the English character as illustrated by them, they would have declared that they were not as other Englishmen, and cared nothing for the lubbers of the other coasts. He ought to know that any one of the Cinque Ports was more than a match for any other port in England. The Yarmouth men, indeed, thought much of themselves, though Yarmouth itself was no better than a dependency of the Cinque Ports, and had once brought a craft of outlandish look, and painted like a Flemish strumpet, to the South Coast, as a present for the king's son ; but the Cinque Port men had soon shown that they and their ships were made of stouter stuff than Yarmouth busses or Yarmouth crews, and had smashed the pretty toy to splinters. They would do the like to-morrow, in spite of the admiral, if they had the chance ; and if the traveller wished to know what spirits there were in Dover, he had but to watch when the tide was flowing, and he might see a prize brought into harbour.

The Seamen
of the Cinque Ports.

Foreigners, except perhaps those who had been reared in the Italian cities, were not in the fourteenth century more accustomed to luxuries than Journey from Dover to London. Englishmen. Carriages and post-horses had been forgotten since the days of the Romans. The traveller from France, from Germany, or from the Low Countries would therefore have been unconscious of hardship when informed that his journey inland must be performed on horseback. If, by any chance, he had demanded some better mode of transit for his luggage, he would have been told with truth that the Records of the High Court of Chancery were moved from place to place on a pack-horse, and that his goods could not be more securely carried than the most precious documents in the realm. As he rode onwards he would have become aware that there was an extreme dearth of provisions, that the whole of Kent had been exhausted in furnishing supplies to the force besieging Calais, and that, although the requisitions had ceased, the prices still betokened a famine. When he came to Rochester or any other walled town in the evening, after sunset, he would have found a watch at the gate, which would have regarded him with suspicion, and possibly have deprived him of his liberty till the morning. If, when he perceived that the gates were closed, he sought a lodging in the suburbs, he would have found but a surly landlord, belonging to a class which the lawyers believed to be in league with brigands. If he was not rejected by an inn-keeper who doubted his character, he would have been entertained by a host whose intentions he would have had good reason to fear. If he retired to rest without the walls, and escaped murder, he would probably have been disturbed by the hue and cry raised in pursuit of some robbers. If he slept in the house of a burgher, within the walls, he would, not less probably, have been roused by some nocturnal affray in the streets.

The journey from Dover to London, with pack-horses in attendance, could hardly have been completed in less than four days. If the traveller had escaped all the dangers of the road, he would, ^{Arrival in London.} in somewhat less than a week, have found himself in sight of the greatest city of England, which he must have entered by London Bridge. He would have passed through the suburb of Southwark, already notorious for its sanctuaries and its stews. As his horse picked its way slowly over the uneven ground near the Surrey side of the river, he would, if he chanced to be a Fleming, have been accosted in his own tongue by the ribald women who had left Flanders for England to traffic in vice. If he had reached the foot of the bridge, crossed it in safety, and been permitted to enter the city, he would have perceived that at the end of every street and alley there were stout chains and barriers either obstructing the passage or made ready to obstruct it when occasion should arise. This, he would have learned, was a device to impede the flight of burglars, thieves, and other offenders who, when pursued, commonly ran towards the river, in the hope of escaping to Southwark. When he rode up to an inn and asked for a bed, he would have had many questions put to him, and many cautions impressed upon him. If he stayed longer than a day and a night, his host would have become responsible for him, as in the lawless days before the Conquest, and would have been anxious that he should not bring the house into ill-repute. He would have been warned that even citizens of good fame were not permitted to go out after sunset, either with arms or without a lantern, and that, if he had any prudence, he would not go out at all till the morrow. If he disregarded these hints, he would have been likely to pass the night in the Tun on Cornhill, or in one of the City Counters; for if he fell into the hands of the watch, though unarmed and bearing a light, he would have been regarded as a stranger, wandering about the streets with the object of breaking the king's peace.

In the morning, no matter where he might have lodged, he would not have had far to walk to visit any of the markets. From the eastern counties corn was brought to Graschirche, or Gracechurch; from the western counties to Newgate; and in the open space near either he would have seen troops of pack-horses with panniers of grain or malt, and here and there Scenes in the markets. a country cart. From the mode of conveyance he might have inferred the condition of the roads which were nearest to the city; but his attention would soon have been diverted by a dispute between a peasant and a corn-dealer or baker. It was the common lot of the rustics to discover that they had mistaken a thief for a purchaser, that the townsman insisted on keeping their wares, and steadily refused to pay the price, and that it was difficult to obtain redress when a citizen of London chose to be dishonest, and his victim came from Upland.

Turn where he might, the traveller could hardly fail to light upon some group which would tell him the character of the people he had come to see. Here, Public punishments. perhaps, a baker with a loaf hung round his neck, was being jeered and pelted in the pillory, because he had given short weight, or because, when men had asked him for bread, he had given them, not a stone, but a lump of iron enclosed by a crust. There, perhaps, an oven was being pulled down, because a baker had been detected in a third offence, and had been compelled to abjure trade in the city for ever. If there were no bakers to be punished on any particular day, the pillories could never have been all without occupants. They were used to punish the sellers of bad meat, poultry, and fish, of false jewellery, of oats good at the top of the sack and bad below, the beggars who pretended to collect money for a hospital and kept it for themselves, the gamblers who played with loaded dice, the fortune-tellers who promised to recover stolen goods, the suborners of false accusations, the cut-purses, and the petty pilferers of every kind. It not unfrequently happened, too, that a passer-by might see some greater offenders exposed to the scoffs of the city rabble. Among them were forgers of charters, deeds, bonds, or letters, counterfeiterers of the seals belonging to the Pope or to English nobles, bedels of wards who had wrongfully set the alderman's mark upon defective measures, personators of holy hermits, of the king's or the sheriff's officers, of summoners in the Ecclesiastical Courts, of purveyors. In another place might have been found a woman on the cucking-stool, to which she had been sentenced as a common scold. In some of the principal streets there would probably have been an opportunity of watching the process by which all kinds of sham wares—sham girdles, sham gloves, sham pouches, sham caps, and sham measures were publicly destroyed in a bonfire.

Should the stranger have grown weary of what he saw in the city of London, and strolled, in search of the law courts, to the city of Westminster, a ghastly spectacle would have been presented to his eyes. All the lepers of London, and others from the villages of Middlesex, flocked to the most frequented road in England, and seated themselves upon it, or near the paths across the fields which led into it. The chief nobles of the realm, the clergy of the two cities, the judges, the pleaders, and the officers of the courts were continually passing to and fro, and, as each came near, the lepers would raise themselves from the ground, show their hideous sores, and beg for alms in the name of God. The foreigner who visited London in the year 1348, might have been told that an order was about to issue for the clearance of the highway, and that the lepers

The highway
from London to Westminster.

would be warned to betake themselves into the country, and to remain at a safe distance from all places of public resort, so that the business of the state might be conducted without danger of contagion. Had he waited to hear the royal proclamation read, he might have been struck by the extreme feebleness of the attempt to preserve the health of the people, and to provide for the poor wretches who were the objects of terror. The ordinary frequenters of the line of traffic were to be examined by competent persons, and, if pronounced leprous, were to be removed by the sheriffs. It was the king's wish that, though they were to be cut off from intercourse with the magnates of the land, they should not suffer from the loss of alms ; and the sheriffs were instructed to stimulate almsgiving for their relief at every fitting opportunity. But in the anxiety to banish them from one place, no care was taken to assign them another. They were to be put away anywhere from public view ; they were not to show themselves even in quest of food ; but if they could find any messenger free from their disease, who would carry necessities to them from the inhabited districts, they might be permitted to accept what was brought. In those days there were hospitals for the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and for many a religious body ; hospitals for the sick existed apparently only in name ; of charity there was little, though of almsgiving there was abundance.

After inspecting the law courts, the foreign visitor would probably have entered Westminster Abbey. As he mentally compared it with similar buildings on the Continent, an attendant might have informed him that business of great interest was about to be transacted close at hand. The king had just directed

Westminster Abbey ; its law-suits.

an order to his treasurer and chamberlain to defray the expenses necessary for the due care of his grandfather's body. The corpse of Edward I., whose memory was always held in great reverence, had been carried to the Abbey, and there preserved in wax, which was renewed from time to time, and which it became necessary to renew in 1348. A bribe to a garrulous official was not less efficacious in those days than in the present, and the foreigner might not only have been present at the waxing of an English king's remains, but might, also, had he pleased, have acquired some knowledge of the tone of thought which prevailed among the abbot and monks. He would have learned that the chief grievance of the moment was the quashing of a jury-panel in a cause which would probably have been decided in favour of the monastery. The Court of King's Bench had held that as some of the jurors were the abbot's tenants, they could not be impartial. The matter in dispute was the liability of the abbot to repair the highway between Tothill and the 'Almorigate,' in Westminster, which had become a common nuisance, and was impassable alike to the king and his lieges. Had the traveller felt any surprise, at the moment, that so powerful a monarch as Edward III. had been compelled to turn aside from the main road because it had fallen into decay within a stone-throw of his own palace, he would have learned, after no long time spent in England, to hear far worse tidings without the least emotion.

If the landlord of an inn had been asked at this time in what direction a stranger about to leave London might most conveniently travel, he would have replied State of the roads. 'by the road to Hertford.' The king hawked this year on the banks of the Lea : he had commanded the sheriffs of Essex and Hertfordshire to make due preparation for him, and to enforce the repair of all bridges by distraint upon the persons who were liable for their maintenance. If the roads were good anywhere they would be good in that country ; but if innkeeper or friend told truth, they would have added that the roads were good nowhere, and that it would be folly to expect better travelling up-land than could be found near Westminster. The burden of road-making, hateful to all land-holders, was especially hateful to the clergy, who were continually asserting that their land was free from it, and acting upon their own assertions until the law courts settled the doubt. The wayfarer, therefore, could not ride far without coming to a spot in dispute, where there was no good Samaritan to help him on his journey, and where he might probably lame his horse, or break his own neck, through the neglect of some neighbouring lord or abbot.

The whole aspect of the country was different from that of the England with which we are familiar in the nineteenth century. In many places the roads were driven through tracts of wood-land, which should have been, and perhaps were, cleared according to law, for the space of two hundred feet on either side. Enough corn was grown on the average to support the population, but little, if any, more ; and the greater part of the open land consisted of pastures, from which was drawn England's chief export and source of wealth—her famous wool and wool-fells. A far greater portion of the soil, however, was under water than at present. There was many a bourne or beck which, like the Holebourne in London, is now dried up ; many a river which, like the Fleet, was once navigable, but is now barely remembered by name. Pools and meres abounded in every county. Every land-holder who owned a close had his lakes and fish-ponds, which supplied him with much of his food during many months of the year, and which commonly proved themselves an irresistible temptation to all the lawless spirits of the time. Through this abundance of wood and water, and the carelessness or wilful neglect of those who should have repaired the roads, a horseman was impeded by so many obstacles, on his journey, that the ordinary Latin word used as an equivalent for our 'travel' was 'labour,' and members of Parliament were chosen with special reference to their powers of labouring in this special meaning of the term. Nor was the expression ill applied to those who had to make their way in spite of broken bridges, of swollen streams, of roads ill-repaired, and of morasses presenting the appearance of firm and elastic turf.

Difficulties of travelling : aspect of the country.

Sloughs and pit-falls, however, were not the greatest dangers by which the roads were beset. Though it might be notorious in the neighbourhood that Dens of robbers. there was a den of robbers near the highway, there might still be no one to warn the traveller; and after he had been murdered, it was improbable that any one would be found to say who had done the deed.

Such an incident as this, however, was altogether insignificant when compared with the organised brigandage which prevailed in every part of the country. Organised brigandage. Houses were set on fire day after day; men and women were captured; ransom was exacted on pain of death to those who refused it, and even those who paid it might think themselves fortunate if they escaped some horrible mutilation. The ordinary powers of the law were, as stated in many commissions of enquiry, quite insufficient to repress the evil; the clear space on either side of the highway, even where the Statute of Winchester was not set at nought, had no effect in deterring bodies of armed men from attacks on weaker parties of travellers; the gangs which lived by rapine had no care to conceal themselves for their own protection, and lay in ambush only in order that their intended victims might not escape them.

The time at which it might have been hoped that merchants travelling together would have been most secure, was the time at which the brigands ^{Attacks at fairs and markets.} reaped their richest harvest. Nothing was so attractive to the robbers as a fair or a market. They commonly stationed themselves at a short distance from an entrance to the town at which one of these great gatherings was to be held, and did almost as they pleased with the wares, the money, and the persons of all who came to buy, to sell, or to make merry. Sometimes warning was given to traders on their way, and they prudently turned back; this was considered a great grievance by the abbot of Abingdon, who lost the tolls and profits which he expected to gain by Abingdon fair, and who complained that his monks were beaten, and the timber of his park was cut down and carried away.

Sometimes the leaders of the bands would change their tactics, and secure their prey by a still bolder and more comprehensive plan. They would wait ^{Bristol in the hands of brigands.} until the fair was at its height, and the towns-people and strangers supposed themselves to be free from danger. They would then make a sudden onslaught, with all the fury of an invading army, would destroy the temporary booths, lay waste the town itself with fire and sword, take the plunder that most pleased their fancy, and, harpy-like, mangle all that they could not move. In the year before the Black Death, Bristol had been for some time in the hands of an armed force, of which the leader seems to have possessed more than ordinary audacity and skill. His men regarded him not only as their captain, but as their king. He issued proclamations in the royal style, commanding one thing, prohibiting another. He took military possession of the port, seized the ships in it with their cargoes, and did not even spare those which were about to sail with provisions for the king's lieges in Gascony. In a commission dated some months later than the first attack, it is recited that his followers, in no small number, were roaming about the town with arms, setting the king's officers at defiance, threatening, robbing, mutilating, and killing. The document concludes, as in innumerable similar cases, with a statement, gravely made, that such doings are contrary to the form of the Statute of Northampton, and that the malefactors are to be lodged in gaol when found and captured.

Burghers and merchants were by no means the only persons who suffered at the hands of the brigands.

Wherever there was booty of any kind to be taken, it was almost certain that an attempt would be made to take it—no matter whether it was money, or a cask of wine, or a prisoner of war—no matter whether it belonged to a chapman, or to a knight, or to the king himself. Two knights were conducting to London a Scottish prisoner—one of the Stuarts—who had been captured in the battle near Durham. On the road a gang of malefactors made an attack with such success that they secured the prize and carried it back to Scotland, where they accepted a ransom of fifty pounds—the real value of the prisoner being estimated at not less than a thousand. The king's envoy returned from Spain

Plunder
taken alike from the King and his Subjects.

in a Spanish ship, which put into Plymouth harbour. Before she could be unladen, a band of armed men forced their way on board, overpowered the crew, and were not deterred from seizing anything they found by the information that it was the property of the king or his ministers. At Thame the servants of the Black Prince went out to fetch supplies for his house and provender for his stables ; they returned, beaten and bruised, and without even so much as the carts and horses which they had taken with them. A trader in the employ of Queen Philippa was entrusted by her with some of her jewels. He lived in a neighbourhood where, it seems, one Adam the Leper had command of a gang. As soon as it was known that booty was to be had, a nocturnal assault was made upon his dwelling. He resisted, and was besieged within his own walls. When all other means failed, the house was set on fire, and the merchant was compelled to give up the royal treasure. At Wighton, also, Philippa sustained a loss of five hundred pounds—a sum equal to many thousand pounds of modern money ; her collector of rents was attacked and robbed on his way home ; and yet so feeble was the law, or so faint the sense of justice in the abstract, that there is appended to the very commission in which the story is told a note which annuls it, and stays all further proceedings—because the offenders had made restitution !

So small was the respect for authority of any kind, that even the king's most trusted messengers were in peril of their lives after they were housed for the night. A serjeant-at-arms, despatched upon important business of State, halted, on his journey northwards, at a Yorkshire village. The house

Murder of the King's Ser-jeant-at-Arms.

in which he stayed was broken open, and set on fire; and the child of his hostess, a widow, was burnt to death. The serjeant himself was dragged off to a neighbouring forest, and there deliberately butchered.

If it could be said with justice that one part of England was at this time more notorious for crime than another, the Marches towards Scotland might claim the pre-eminence. From Newcastle northwards the whole country had recently been devastated by the Scottish invaders. The tenants of the king's demesnes had lost everything, even to their houses. They were wandering homeless, hither and thither, and many of them, no doubt, joined the outlaws, and resolved to inflict on others the sufferings which they had endured themselves. The warlike spirit which had been handed down from the barbarous ages was still predominant in England, and naturally existed in greatest force near the seat of war. Centuries afterwards the border-land towards Scotland was famous for its crimes, and not the least of the benefits conferred by the Union was the annihilation of the Marches. It is, therefore, no matter for wonder that in early times the northern forests were the scenes of the greatest atrocities.

The distinction, however, between the criminal population and the better classes was by no means well marked in the fourteenth century. If the townsmen suffered sometimes at the hands of the outlaws, there was a class of men in some of the towns which had no little sympathy with the brigands outside, and acted in a manner precisely similar. It is difficult to conceive that Bristol could have been taken and held by a hostile party of Englishmen, who had no friends within the walls. And, whatever doubt there

State of the Marches towards Scotland.

Crime and the right of private war.

may be upon that subject, it is at least certain that Yarmouth could send forth more than three hundred men, with ensign displayed, to harry the surrounding country, to burn, to rob, to hold to ransom, and to slay. Nor is it less certain that the whole band and their leader were pardoned, in consideration of the good service rendered by him and by the men of Yarmouth to the king. In such incidents is to be discerned the vitality of the ancient right of private war, of which brigandage was only one development. Some of the Bristol men most probably had a grudge to satisfy against ship-owners of their own or another port; the Yarmouth men may have had some quarrel with a neighbouring town or land-owner; but the criminal tendencies of modern times seem in many cases to have been handed down from a period when that which is now considered crime was thought very nearly akin to virtue.

The knights, or, in other words, the class corresponding to our modern country gentry, were commonly engaged in exploits which it is extremely difficult to distinguish from brigandage; and the clergy—from the abbots down to the chaplains—followed the example set them by the knights. The Countess of Lincoln had a free warren and chace at Kingston Lacy. A band, more than fifty in number, entered, killed the game, and deliberately cut down the timber, to the value of two thousand pounds of ancient currency, and carried it off. Among the accused were the Abbot of Sherborne, the Abbot of Middleton, and the Prior of Horton. Three knights, and a force more than sixty strong, with many chaplains in its ranks, broke a close belonging to the Archbishop of Canterbury, drove off his cattle, cut down his trees, reaped his corn, and marched quietly away with the plunder. A gang of more than seventy, among whom were no less than five parsons of churches, committed a similar offence at Carlton. Two parsons of churches were among those accused of breaking a park owned by the Earl of Northampton, and stealing his cattle in one place, a vicar of doing the like in another place, and two knights of breaking a house at Colne. The Prior of Bollington was charged with a robbery of horses, cattle, sheep, and pigs. A knight and a chaplain aided in taking goods and putting the owner under restraint. Three clergymen, who were either parsons or vicars of churches, and two others, who had attained some clerical dignity, were concerned with a knight and about thirty inferiors in damaging a park of the Bishop of Durham, at Howden, to the extent of a thousand pounds. A knight, a parson, and at least two others of the clergy, broke the close and house of a Prebendary of York. The Sheriff of Devonshire and his followers, not acting by virtue of a writ, made an attack upon one Richard de Stapleton, and deprived him of property worth a hundred pounds. It would be tedious to enumerate at greater length the deeds of violence recorded on one Roll of a single year; let it suffice to state that the Roll is only one out of many sources of information; that it consists of three parts; that each part consists of more than forty skins of parchment; and that among those skins there are few which do not contain one reference or many to some act of lawlessness committed by clerks or by knights.

Acts resembling brigandage committed by Knights and by the Clergy.

In many cases there may be reason to suspect that the actors in these strange scenes believed their leader to have some title to the land on which the outrages were committed. The subsequent statutes against forcible entry on land in dispute in some measure confirm this explanation. Possession by the strong arm had for so many centuries constituted the best title to land that the best legal claim to it was almost valueless until practically asserted by setting foot on the soil. These gallant knights and abbots, therefore, who were continually taking peaceful occupants by surprise, may in some cases have acted in the name of justice ; but, unless it be assumed that the title of 'chivaler' necessarily confers the virtues collectively known as chivalry, it must be obvious that the right to enter must have been a most convenient excuse for any adventurer who coveted his neighbour's flocks and herds, or timber, or crops, or horses, or even money. It is a most significant fact that in many instances in which the house was attacked, as well as the park or the chace, the robbers succeeded in carrying off the title-deeds as well as the timber.

They are illustrated by the subsequent Statutes against forcible entry.

A few examples may suffice to show how closely connected was the mere forcible entry with open brigandage, and how close is the connection of both with the primitive seizure of land and other property by barbarians, and with those acts which, when committed at the present day, we denominate crimes. A tenant in chief of a manor in Worcestershire died ; the escheator entered, in the king's name, according to the usual custom ; and the legal course would have been for the next heir, if there was one living, to await the finding of the inquisition, which it was the escheator's duty to hold. But one Guy Breton, probably with the object of asserting that the lands were not held as alleged by the king's minister, and that the latter had no right to take them into the king's hand, summoned his followers to his aid, expelled the men holding in the king's name, and took the rents and profits for himself. This may be regarded as a comparatively innocent case of forcible entry. That which follows may have been a mere forcible entry in design, but assumed a very different character in execution. The Bishop of Exeter complained that a great multitude of men, one of whom, mentioned by name, was a chaplain, banded themselves together and marched in military array to one of his manors. They demolished fences, gates, and doors, broke into the buildings, and carried off two hundred bullocks, a hundred cows, a thousand sheep, and various other goods and chattels. The whole neighbourhood was thrown into a panic at the sight of the armed men, who were in such numbers that it was at first supposed a foreign enemy had landed, and was collecting supplies for his army.

Close connection of the first barbarous taking of land by force, the forcible entry in assertion of a right, and open brigandage.

The temptation which forcible entry presented for the commission of deeds still worse is illustrated by an attack

Crimes committed by Knights and Priors at the head of a military force. which was made upon a manor in Wiltshire, within the verge of the household of the king's son Lionel, who was Guardian of England during the king's absence abroad. The attacking force marched in military array to the scene of action, and began the attack by night. They soon forced their way into the dwelling-house, and killed as many of the inmates as they pleased. They ravished the widow of Michael de la Beche, and frightened her chaplain to death. They made a considerable number of prisoners, whom they forced to march with their own body in quest of new adventures. They set all law at defiance, and their actions were described as traitorous in the Letters Patent, in which the story is told. Among those accused of the outrage were a 'chivaler,' the Prior of Bristol, and the Prior of Holand. But even such deeds as these were by no means rare, and seem to have been a common ending of an attempt to enforce a real or pretended title to land by entry. A knight named Ercedecne, accompanied by a priest from Haccombe, the parson of the Church of Botus-Fleming, another clerk, and a numerous band, at one time seizes horses and other goods at Penpol-by-Saltash; at another time he makes an attack, with the same associates, at Haccombe, and drives off cattle of no small value. At last it appears that he is living the life of an outlaw, marching from county to county at the head of his men, and doing habitually from inclination that which, perhaps, he did at first with no other object but to assert a right.

Side by side with the custom of entering upon disputed land by force still survived, though contrary to law, the kindred and no less ancient custom of gratifying personal animosity by private war. A knight was on the march with a band of armed retainers, and with some men-at-arms in the king's service. With him were the under-sheriff of Cambridgeshire and some inferior officers. It might have been supposed that so powerful a body would have been in no danger of attack, or at least that they would have been in no danger when near a county town. Yet Cambridge was the scene of a furious onslaught prompted, to use the words of the commission, by hatred and malice. The assailants were, as usual, in military array, gained a complete victory, killed the leader opposed to them, and seized everything of value which the escort had attempted to guard. The under-sheriff lost a great sum of money—a portion of the royal revenue. The king's writs also fell into the hands of the marauders, and the king's business was delayed because the sheriff was deprived of his instructions. The unpopularity of the under-sheriff may, indeed, have been incurred in the execution of his duties, and one of the motives of the exploit may have been dislike of the office as well as a grudge against the officer or his companions. But, whatever the causes may have been, the deed shows clearly enough that violence was still superior to law, and that war was still waged by private persons, even against the ministers of the king.

When a particular jurisdiction was impugned, it was maintained in precisely the same manner as a private feud or a claim to land, and with as little regard to decency as to law. A man was killed in the cemetery of Worcester Cathedral, in which the bishop asserted that the coroners of the township or city had no authority. The towns-people, however were of a different opinion, declined to await the coming of the county coroner, and proceeded to assert their claim by force. The two bailiffs (at that time the chief personages of the town) marched with the populace to the cemetery, in irresistible force, and carried off the body. They caused an inquest to be held on it by their own coroners, and afterwards had it buried within their own bounds. But a great number of them were resolved on vengeance as well as that which they considered justice. In warlike fashion they invaded the lands of the Priory, and laid them waste. They drove the retainers of the house before them to the Priory-walls. The Prior asserted that his men defended themselves as well as they could, without breaking the peace—an expression which probably means no more than that they were worsted in the encounter. The building was then besieged, and arrows were shot at the defenders whenever there was an opportunity. At last the townsmen seem to have grown weary of their sport, and, after attempting in vain to burn the Priory and Cathedral, left the monks in peace. The commission of enquiry concerning the outrage ends with a curious anti-climax, and dilates upon the loss sustained by the Prior—in hares and rabbits !

The township of Worcester asserts a jurisdiction against the Prior by force of arms.

When it is remembered that all these deeds appear, among others like them, upon the rolls of a single year, it may perhaps be thought that enough has already been told to show how slowly innate barbarism was affected by improved legislation. But before the age can be seen as it actually was, there are many other matters to be brought to light.

In the special commissions to hear and determine accusations of those offences which may be described under the general name of brigandage, it was usual to insert the names of a number of suspected persons, and to add that others unknown Simple murders distinguished from greater offences. were also concerned. In other commissions, to enquire who were the perpetrators of ill deeds, it is sometimes stated that the offenders had acted in no small numbers, sometimes that they were associated in conventicles, not seldom that they were roaming about in vast multitudes. It is impossible to extract from such vague expressions any figures sufficiently precise to be compared with modern statistics. Where the names of seventy are mentioned, there is no method of ascertaining that they are not a very small portion of a very large gang ; where only ten are mentioned, there is no certainty that the ' others ' are not simply part of a legal form, and that the ten are not all who were even believed to have been implicated.

A vast multitude may be five thousand or more, or fifty or less, according to the tone of mind of the describer or the elasticity of legal language. Apart, however, from these crimes of extraordinary magnitude, there were ordinary murders of single individuals, which came under the notice of the coroners, as in our own times. The rolls are unfortunately not complete for the whole of England; but for one county, and that the largest, they are, if not complete, at least sufficiently full of information to show how great a stride we have made towards giving security to life. In Yorkshire there were, in the year before the Black Death, at least eighty-eight cases of felonious homicide brought to the notice of the coroners in the ordinary course. In the whole of England and Wales, the average of verdicts of wilful murder returned by coroners' juries (including cases of infanticide) has, during the decade from 1860 to 1869, not exceeded two hundred and fifty. Yorkshire includes about one-tenth of the whole area of England and Wales; and eighty-eight murders in Yorkshire may therefore be taken to represent eight hundred and eighty in England and Wales. But Yorkshire was not, in the fourteenth century, the most populous part of England; and

Comparison of past and present totals.

the whole population of England and Wales did not, a few years after the Black Death, exceed two millions and a half. The population of England and Wales now exceeds twenty-two millions; and if it be conceded that the Black Death and succeeding pestilences swept away two millions out of four millions and a half, there was not, in the early part of the reign of Edward III., more than a fifth part of the number of inhabitants at present in England. In order, therefore, to compare the murders of the nineteenth century with the murders of the fourteenth, it is necessary to multiply eight hundred and eighty by five. The result is that, if it were possible to conceive society in the same state now as then, there would be four thousand four hundred simple murders per annum, in addition to all the horrors of brigandage and private war. In other words, the security of life is now at least eighteen times as great as it was in the age of chivalry.

Should it be asked what was the character of the women when such was the life of the men, the answer would be that women were, except in the very highest rank, almost as brutal as their husbands or their paramours. Women in England had burned women to death in the tenth century ; they had been set on the stool of filth, to be mocked as brewers of bad ale in the eleventh ; on the stool of filth they had been jeered as common scolds from time immemorial ; they were legally beaten by their husbands down to a comparatively recent period. They were in the fourteenth century such as the circumstances in which they had lived had made them—strong in muscle but hard of heart—more fit to be the mothers of brigands than to rear gentle daughters or honest sons. In the towns, some of them found employment in weaving, brewing, and baking ; but it would be difficult to define their exact position when thus occupied. The websters, brewsters, and baxters were at one time, no doubt, female slaves, who wove cloth or linen fabrics, brewed ale, and baked bread, for their lords. Afterwards some of them pursued their crafts for their own profit, until at last the feminine designation was applied alike to craftsman and to craftswoman. In the reign of Edward III. webster was no longer a word distinctive of sex ; nor in all probability were brewster and baxter. There hardly less brutal than the men.

The women

is, however, the evidence of the statute book that women still worked in brewhouses, still earned their living by the laborious occupation of making bread for their fellow townspeople, if not in London, at any rate in other towns. To women were still applied those punishments which had been introduced by the men whose practice it was to buy their wives and sell their daughters. It is, therefore, not surprising that women sometimes appear as the actors in crimes which must have required masculine strength and an absence of all the qualities now considered feminine.

A bakehouse seems to have been the favourite receptacle for a dead body after a murder had been committed ; and the heroine of the following story did only what others had done before her. At Middleton, in Derbyshire, there lived a man whose wife bore a name well known to the readers of mediæval romances—Isolda or Isoult. As he lay one night asleep in his bed, this female Othello took him by the neck and strangled him. As soon as he was dead, she carried the body to an oven which adjoined their chamber, and piled up a fire to destroy the traces of her guilt. But though she had so far shown the energy and power of a man, her courage seems to have failed her at the last moment. She took to flight, and her crime was discovered. She was not, however, by any means an exceptional woman for the period in which she lived. Not only do women appear continually as the receivers of felons and stolen goods, but they are frequently mentioned in the lists of names given in the special commissions which relate to brigandage and the greater deeds of violence.

When such was the character of the men and the women, there is, perhaps, not much reason to wonder at the undisguised conflict of offenders with the ministers of justice. In many of the commissions of enquiry, to which reference has already been made, it appears that the armed bands which infested the country were in the habit of obstructing the judges by force. This, to use the language of the records, they had done openly and notoriously on many occasions. Nor were brawls, and riots, and bloodshed by any means uncommon within the walls of the law-courts and in the presence of the Bench itself. At Cambridge, when the justices were sitting, a man drew a long knife and made an attack upon the Mayor. At York a number of men—no common outlaws, but the mercers, saddlers, bakers, skinnners, spurriers, and tailors of the place—entered the castle, fell upon the sheriff's retainers and made them the prisoners instead of the prisoners taken according to the form of the law. At Somerton, where the justices of assise were hearing causes; one Robert Mansel made a furious onslaught upon Robert Brent in the justice-hall. Mansel had friends in court who drew their swords and knives when he set them the example, pursued Brent to the bar, and would have killed their enemy there in sight of the judges, the jury, and all the spectators, had not assistance been found. Yet so ordinary an event was this, so little was it regarded as an unpardonable offence, that the ringleader, after a few appearances at Westminster, was dismissed upon payment of a fine.

Conflicts with the ministers of Justice : bloodshed in Court.

In these scenes it is not difficult to discern once more the old partisan spirit of the days before the Conquest. All who said or did anything offensive to any man able to command a few followers were at his mercy unless they could themselves command a greater number. And when even the courts of Partisanship : Intimidation of prosecutors and suitors.

law were not sacred from violence the intimidation practised outside them may be easily conjectured. Nor are we left to conjecture alone upon this subject. Not only is it lamented in the Statutes of Winchester and Westminster the First that true verdicts could not be obtained from juries, but the rolls show precisely what might have been expected from the surrounding circumstances. At Dalton, near Furness Abbey, an indictment was found, at the sheriff's turn, against a notorious robber. His friends were at no great distance, and in sufficient number to overpower all who left the court. They distributed blows and threats in profusion, and with such good effect that no further action was taken in the matter until there was a commission to enquire into the circumstances. In Cambridgeshire some members of one of the bands of brigands were appealed and indicted for maihem and murder. The gang lay in wait for the appellors and the finders of the indictments, punished them for what they had done, and menaced them with loss of limb or life if they continued the prosecution. The power of the banditti could not be set at defiance, for all knew that the threats would be carried into execution upon the least provocation; and even one of the appellors who had lost his brother did not dare to prosecute his appeal.

Intimidation, such as this, was not practised solely towards jurors and parties to suits, nor solely by brigands, nor solely against private individuals. It was a service of no small difficulty and danger to collect the sums voted by Parliament to the king. All who had to pay seem to have felt themselves aggrieved; and the rolls teem with commissions to enquire, county by county, concerning resistance to the officials authorised to receive fifteenths, and tenths, and subsidies.

Armed resistance to the Collectors of Taxes.

In innumerable instances it became necessary to distraint, and distraint was commonly the signal for a riot. The unfortunate collector had only too often to complain that the cattle which he had seized had been taken from him by force, that the king's writ had been torn to shreds before his eyes, that he had himself been compelled to fly, that he had been pursued from village to village, and that he had barely escaped with his life in the end.

The qualities of the knight errant and the gentleman have often been attributed to the highwayman and the brigand. Nor can it indeed be disputed that the highwayman and the brigand have much in common with the knight errant. It has often been supposed also that in an age when men ordinarily resort to force for the attainment of their ends, there is an absence of the fraud and cunning and chicane which are said to disgrace periods of greater refinement. Poets and romancers have taught that an open countenance could best have been found under a knight's helmet, a great heart under a knight's coat of mail, a hand incapable of forgery under a knight's gauntlet. If the outlaw has committed acts of brutal violence, they have been attributed partly to a wild love of freedom, partly to a hatred of the meanness which he discovers in those who respect the rights of others. A life of adventure, with the forest for a home, and the haunts of men for a hunting-ground, is a repetition, with a slight change, of the life led by the noble savage. And is it not noble to take that which others cannot keep, to gratify a wish as soon as it arises, to assert superiority over the rest of mankind by depriving them of their goods, their daughters, their wives, and their lives? In such elements of nobility the peasants, and even the knights of the fourteenth century were only a little inferior to the Teutonic hordes who overran the Roman Empire, and those hordes only a little inferior to their remote ancestors who had gained a living by the chase.

Knights errant, brigands, and 'noble savages' are not incapable of the meaner crimes.

The notion, indeed, of the savage, that civilisation is an unholy institution which deprives him of the world as a free hunting-ground, was by no means extinct in the reign of Edward III. In all those cases of forcible entry which have been already mentioned, the game found in the wood-lands was carried off as spoil by the attacking force, and innumerable instances might be given of exploits which had no other issue. These have in our own time degenerated into poaching affrays, of which the most formidable would have been altogether unworthy of notice five hundred years ago. It is, therefore, most important to enquire whether, when the savage loses his savageness he loses nobility at the same time; whether deceit and trickery become the substitutes for threats and blows; whether, as the intellect becomes more highly developed, the moral character becomes more contemptible. If it should appear that baseness and cruelty went hand in hand in the days of barbarism long passed away, it will be evident that the progressive diminution of cruelty is at least a clear advantage without any counterpoise on the other side.

There are some crimes which lie on the border-land between those which veneration for the past ranges in the class of the chivalrously venial and those which in modern times are considered unchivalrously mean. A bold lover, for instance, breaks into the house of the woman he desires to wed. She has no wish to place her fortune or person at his disposal, but he has a mind to secure one or both. He gives her a simple alternative—either to be ravished on the spot or to be married on the following Saturday. It is Wednesday, and to gain time she consents to the marriage.' He is not content with her word, but exacts an oath; he doubts her intention to keep her promise even after she has sworn; he therefore watches her house, waylays her when she comes out, and repeats more forcibly in the open air the arguments which he had applied within walls. Such are the details of a case which appears among the records of criminal proceedings in the year before the Black Death, and which throws some light upon the treatment of heiresses who were frequently carried off by violence, and who were not protected by statute before the reign of Henry VII.

Crimes on the border-land between the 'chivalrously' venial and the unchivalrously mean.

If it is possible for Romance to represent the abduction of heiresses and the marriage of women by compulsion as gallantries rather than as crimes, it is at least out of her power to represent embezzlement as an act of virtue. But the highest officials were, in the fourteenth century, not less ready to embezzle than to strike. The Master of the Horse North of Trent is no sooner dead than it is discovered that he has appropriated a thousand pounds of the king's money. His subordinates had, during his tenure of office, been following his example; some of the animals entrusted to their care they had sold, others they had taken for their own private use, and the rest they had permitted to die of hunger. Commissions to enquire concerning the misdeeds of officers employed in every branch of the king's service appear on the rolls at the very earliest time at which enrolments begin to be made, appear at the time now under consideration, and seem to be almost characteristic of the age of chivalry. The characteristic of the 'Age of Chivalry.'

Dishonesty

knight who becomes owner of a ship—perhaps with the chivalrous intention of leading the life of a pirate—is not ashamed to take a cargo of wool and defraud the king by escaping out of port without paying duty. He despises the merchant, the burgher, the trader of every kind, and shows his superiority by accepting their money for the performance of certain services, and by omitting to keep his word after he has received his price. The custom of fixing the Staple of exported English wool on the continent gives him ample opportunities for the display of his skill in the art of cheating a townsman ; and in the year before the Black Death there was a complaint that many English merchants had been killed, and that their wool, to the value of twenty thousand pounds, had fallen into the hands of the French, because the men who had agreed to provide a sufficient convoy had refused to fulfil the engagement, after levying a toll upon every sack to be exported.

It need be no matter for wonder that in an age in which the traditions of barbarism retained much of their vitality, the first rude efforts at commerce were not, in all cases, remarkable for self-denial and good faith. The experience of many generations had proved that the shortest way to obtain possession of land was to take it ; when property of another kind began to increase, similar modes of acquisition at once suggested themselves, and were very commonly adopted. It has already been shown that the citizens of London were burglars a century after the Conquest ; it has been shown that in the reign of Edward III. the knights carried into trade and into their dealings with heiresses practices very similar to those by which a claim to a manor was ordinarily asserted either rightfully or infected by Fraud at its birth.

Commerce

wrongfully. Neither class had as yet any regard for honesty; and their simple idea of life was that they should gain whatever they wanted in any manner which seemed to promise the most rapid success. Commerce, for many a century in danger of being strangled by force, was thus also necessarily infected by fraud at its very birth. Where there was one individual who perceived that it was best both for himself and for the community to accumulate wealth by industry, there were a hundred round him to whom it seemed much easier to snatch the fruits of his labour away from him, or to deprive him of them by a trick. In such a state of society not only is violence naturally met by violence, but deceit is apt to be anticipated by deceit. It is most difficult for a man to be honest who doubts the honesty of all about him; and when the townsman develops a trade among neighbours who recognise only the rule of the strongest, he uses all the weapons with which nature has endowed him to thwart the designs of his adversaries, and only too probably disgraces his calling by some disreputable act of imposture.

Such considerations as these might naturally lead us to expect that fraud will be found more prevalent in proportion to commerce when commerce is weak and the warlike spirit is strong, and that it will be less prevalent when the warlike spirit grows weaker—when commerce develops, and is developed by, intellectual improvement. Fraud and force are so nearly akin in the perpetration of crime that the diminution of the latter can hardly fail to be accompanied by the diminution of the former. It is but a natural correlation of social existence that when the country gentleman is no better than a brigand, the merchant is no better than a smuggler, and the tradesman no better than a cheat. It is no less a correlation of national growth that, when the land-holder has become more refined through the arts and the culture which have their birth-place in the towns, the townsmen themselves are gainers in an equal degree, and give up dishonesty to as great an extent as the land-holders abandon brute force. No class has yet been able to enjoy a monopoly of honesty, nor has any nation yet been able to dispense with punishments for fraud. Complaints have been made in every generation that it is more depraved than its predecessors. But we need only consult our Public Records to assure ourselves beyond doubt, not only that crimes of violence have greatly decreased, but that the very meannesses, deceptions, and crimes against property, which we are apt to lament, are our inheritance from a less civilised age, and have decreased with the growth of wealth and of knowledge.

Intimate connection of Force and Fraud.

Reference has already been made to the petty thefts and rogueries, to the false weights, false measures, and various arts by which the London tradesmen of the fourteenth century defrauded their patrons or the rustics who brought goods to market; and it is unnecessary to dilate further on the small details of such a subject. But the class corresponding to our modern merchants resorted to practices which can no more be justified than those of the little mediæval shop-keeper.

True patriotism was not to be found in an age when 'the country' meant no more than the neighbourhood in which a man lived, and in which the guilty had good reason to hope that they would be declared innocent by jurors of their guild. It is, therefore, not surprising that English merchants were in the habit of supplying nations at war against England with provisions bought at English fairs, and weapons wrought by English hands. When England was at war with France, La Rochelle was supplied with food by English traitors; when England was at war with Scotland, the Scottish camp was fed from English markets, and English soldiers fell by English arrows shot from English bows by Scottish arms. The knight was little behind the trader in treachery, and a 'chivaler' who held the office of the King's Arrayer of Archers levied a sum in excess of that which was required for the due execution of his office, and appropriated the whole to his own use.

Treachery of merchants and knights.

The first thought of the exporter was how he could escape payment of the duty; the first thought of the importer how he could introduce base money from abroad, and put it into circulation in Eng-^{Evasion of duties.}land. Upon the rolls may be seen commission after commission to enquire concerning merchants who had fraudulently laden their ships and sailed without either paying the sum claimed on behalf of the king, or rendering any account. The offence, as is commonly added in the records, was one of daily occurrence. It was perpetrated in various ways—sometimes, perhaps, by a well-laid scheme for eluding the vigilance of the officers, sometimes by a false declaration that the goods were to be conveyed from one English port to another—most frequently, in all probability, by collusion with the collectors of the customs.

The*importation of false coin was also one of the commonest branches of the merchant's trade, and commissions were sent into the various counties for the purpose of discovering who were the offen-^{Importation of false coin.}ders. The exportation of sterling English coin was contrary to law; but the practice of the mediæval traders was to exchange it with foreign dealers for money which was either of light weight, or of base metal, and to take the difference of value as their profit. The consequence was a general want of confidence in the currency. But for this the king and his advisers were not less responsible than the dishonest merchants. It had long been a common expedient, when the crown was in want of funds, to debase the coinage of the authorised mints, and so to reap a temporary advantage at the expense of the public. The only excuse was that finance had never been made a study, and was but little understood. The great lesson to be learnt from these proceedings, when compared with the practice and principles of modern times, is that enlightenment, even if acting in no other way, has the effect of diminishing crime, both by adding to the facility with which it can be detected, and by showing that an ill example set by the governing powers fails to attain the desired object—except, perhaps, for a moment—and greatly retards the progress of civilisation.

It may seem strange to those who associate the meanest crimes with periods of the greatest refinement, but it is nevertheless true, that in this age of English manufacturers of false coin. barbarism there were native manufacturers of false coin who competed successfully with the importers from abroad. At Aylesbury, according to the record of a single Gaol Delivery, one person accused of false coining died in prison, and another was brought to trial for the same offence, and for having the instruments of a coiner in his possession. At Scarborough a man and his wife, with an assistant, had a factory on no mean scale, and made not only false money, but false plate. The metals which they used were copper, brass, and quicksilver. With these they counterfeited both silver and gold, and apparently supplied other coiners with the materials for deception. In London a coiner was sent to the Tower to await his trial for an offence which in those days was held to be treason; and there are numerous other instances in which persons were accused of having false coin in their possession, though not of having imported it.

The great quantity of base coin in circulation not only inflicted great hardships on those who incurred loss by accepting it in payment, but inevitably caused false accusations to be brought against many who had become innocently possessed of it.

False charges connected with the coinage.

The king's officers were always ready to make a charge when they had not received a bribe, and, no doubt, equally ready to conceal a crime when they were sufficiently paid. At Kingston-on-Hull the Examiner of the port caused two men to be apprehended for having some of the base money known as Lushboroughs. One of the prisoners alleged that he had borrowed fifteen shillings from the other, had added them to forty-five shillings of his own, and trafficked in Hull with the whole—a sum equal perhaps to sixty pounds of modern currency. Upon examination it was proved that the coins were Lushboroughs to the extent of a twelfth part. The Lushborough money was sent into the Court of King's Bench for inspection, and the Hull examiner retained the good coin in his own hands. The borrower pleaded, with perhaps unconscious sarcasm, that he was a layman, ignorant of letters, that he had never crossed the sea in his life, and that he did not import the base money. His fellow-prisoner admitted the loan, and declared that he received the coin as the price of some wool, and that he also had not imported it. The jury acquitted both, and the terms of the verdict showed plainly the motive of the the Chancellor, who at once denounced the self-styled purveyor as an impostor and directed a writ to the Sheriff of Middlesex for his arrest. The usual scene of violence followed. The pretender resisted the attempts to take him and maintained a running fight with the villagers who pursued him with bows and arrows. At last he was wounded in the side, captured, and brought to trial; but, with the common good fortune which attended criminals in his time, he escaped punishment by means of a technical flaw in his arraignment, and was dismissed upon finding sureties for his good behaviour.

Forgery and imposture of a similar kind aided in bringing every branch of the administration into disrepute. The Bishop of Exeter complained that he was the victim of a system of fraud by which other inhabitants of Devonshire had also suffered great damage. A trespass real or imaginary was made the subject of a writ forged with some skill and used with more audacity. Counterfeit seals were attached to the counterfeit writs, which some of the gang of conspirators had sufficient address to present to the Justices of either Bench as being returned into court by the sheriff with his endorsement. The persons against whom these sham legal proceedings were instituted, had no notice, and, as a matter of course, made no appearance. The false returns produced before the judges were evidence that the defendants had been summoned to appear and had failed; judgment went by default, and a real writ to carry it into execution issued to the real sheriff of the county. The sufferer by the scheme was therefore first made aware of it by the sheriff's officers coming to take possession of his lands and goods on behalf of the schemers.

Forged writs and returns in Courts of Law.

Here, as elsewhere, it is difficult to distinguish between a knightly desire to appropriate land and the brigand's war against society in general. Those gangs whose exploits are told in song, with praises of their audacity and generosity, resorted to all, and more than all, the mean arts which are practised in more civilised times. A band of robbers in Suffolk seems to have been equally skilful in the use of brute force and threats, in smuggling wool out of port after it had been stolen, in importing bad money, in forging documents, and in counterfeiting seals. Sometimes they would present themselves at a house and assure the owner that unless he at once paid a certain sum he would be indicted on several counts at the next visitation of the justices. Sometimes they would adopt the shorter method of beating the householder until he paid as much money as they demanded. Sometimes they would appear in church on Sunday, make a sudden attack, and exact a heavy ransom as the price of life; and what they did on Sunday in church, they did on week-days in the market-place. One day a chaplain, who was a member of their body, disguises himself at the instigation of the others, as a merchant of Ghent, who was commonly employed by Philippa, the king's consort. He exhibits what appears to be her seal, but is in fact a counterfeit, and demands a large sum of money from her bailiff. The first attempt is unsuccessful as the seal is not thought a sufficient warrant. The chaplain returns soon afterwards with a forged letter in which the queen apparently asks for a still larger sum. This device also fails, and the chaplain again retires. After a sufficient interval of time, another brigand appears as a sheriff's officer, and produces a writ directed to the Sheriff of Suffolk under the King's Secret Seal to distrain the goods and chattels of the bailiff for the required sum on behalf of the merchant of Ghent. He also shows a receipt for the money, signed by the queen, which is of course, like the writ and the seal, the work of a confederate. The bailiff hesitates ; the brigand, in his capacity of sheriff's officer, tenders his advice, and again calls attention to the receipt. In the end the bailiff satisfies the demand, and receives the forged receipt in exchange for his coin.

Conviction in such a case as this, did not always lead to punishment, even though the king might refuse his pardon. The man who would forge the queen's receipt, would not hesitate to forge a transcript of the King's Letters Patent. A case appears on one of the rolls of the year 1348 in which common report attributed to one William Rydout, the practice of counterfeiting various royal letters. He was apprehended, and on him was found what purported to be a copy of a general pardon of homicides and felonies granted to him by the king. The seal, however, had been torn off, and it seems to have been held that the forgery was incomplete unless it could be shown that the seal had been counterfeited. Neither counterfeit seals nor instruments for making them were discovered in the possession of the prisoner. The finding of the jury was, therefore, that the offence of forging letters patent had not been proved. The accused was allowed to go at large on finding sureties for his future behaviour, but his goods and chattels were attached until his character could be cleared. Such looseness in the administration of justice, which has yet to be further considered, was, no doubt, at once a cause and an effect of the prevailing depravity.

The extent, however, to which forgery prevailed, at a time when there were but few educated persons in the kingdom, cannot be estimated from the comparatively unimportant instances which have already been detailed. In the same year in which the rolls tell of those cases, there appears a commission to the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Chancellor, the Sceneschal or Steward of the Chamber, and others, to enquire concerning a wholesale system of fraud by which, to use the words of the document, grave damage had been caused to the Exchequer, and manifest suffering and impoverishment to the people. Numerous payments and allowances, all of large sums, had been made on the faith of bonds to which had been attached counterfeits of the Great Seal, on the faith of forged bills, and sometimes even without the semblance of a warrant in any form whatever. The whole department was evidently in a state of the greatest corruption—rotten within, and the subject of predatory attacks from without. Other records of the period throw more light upon the matter, and show how powerless were the constituted authorities to apply a sufficient remedy, even if a remedy was honestly desired. Certain merchants had bound themselves to return into the Exchequer on a fixed day a number of bills which had issued from the Office of the Wardrobe, so that the king might be freed from the burden of debts of long standing. They had of course received, or were to receive, an equivalent in one form or other for the responsibility which they had thus incurred. But when the time came round they prayed for delay on the ground that forgery had been detected in many bills, and that they were afraid of presenting false instead of real documents. The request was not considered unreasonable, and a writ was sent to the Treasurer and Barons of the Exchequer, instructing them that a respite had been granted to the merchants

Forgery of Exchequer
Bills.

for three years—though of course the favour was not accorded until arrangements had been made to pay for it.

The manner in which the forged bills were used, and the magnitude of the evil are illustrated by the following

Mode of raising money upon forged Exchequer
Bills.

case, which was brought before the King in Council. Nicholas Boylyel complained that Walter Yarmouth, one of the king's ministers (or, as we should now say, an officer of one of the public departments), brought him a bill purporting to be sealed with the seal of the King's Wardrober, and showing that the king owed 312*l.* to a certain lord, named John Beaumont. Upon this security Yarmouth borrowed ten pounds, leaving the document in pledge. Another day, he produced three similar bills, similarly sealed, by which it appeared that Godekyn De la Rule, a merchant, was the king's creditor for more than 1000*l.*, and upon these he obtained an advance of 31*l.* He returned time after time, each time with bills for a larger amount, and succeeded every time in effecting a loan. His last exploit was to raise fifty-two pounds upon three bills representing 2,400*l.* owed by the king to De la Rule. After this the forgery was confessed by Yarmouth, whose sentence was imprisonment for life. It is worthy of remark that the rolls are full of instances in which hanging was the punishment awarded to thefts of small amount, that the bills forged by this government official amounted to no less than six thousand and eighteen pounds of the money of the period, and that according to some estimates the sum must have been equivalent to more than a hundred thousand pounds of modern currency.

An account of the forgeries for which the dark ages were most remarkable would be incomplete without some reference to those forgeries by members of religious houses, which have caused innumerable spurious charters or deeds of grant to be handed down to posterity. Though the crime was very common, both before the Conquest and after, it is not easy to discover many instances of conviction. Abbots and bishops had usually sufficient interest to keep accusations out of court, or, like the famous William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, to obtain a general pardon, expressly framed in such terms as to cover all 'rasings of records.' A case, however, brought to light a little after the time now under consideration, shows one of the methods by which authority was given to false documents. A dispute arose between the abbot of Bruerne and the abbot of Cirencester, respecting the right to certain land. There was in existence a charter, by which Richard I. granted to a former abbot of Bruerne and his monks, various lands and liberties in various parts of England, but by which it was not possible to establish the claim against the rival house at Cirencester. It occurred to some one at Bruerne that if the name of an unimportant place could be erased, and the name of the coveted territory could be inserted instead, the charter would appear conclusive evidence in favour of his monastery. The device was carried into execution; 'Fish-hide' disappeared, and 'East-leach' was substituted. It was not, however, thought prudent to exhibit in a court of law a document which had been thus ingeniously manipulated. The charter was presented for 'confirmation,' which was, perhaps, granted as a matter of routine, upon payment of a fee, but more probably by collusion between the monks and a clerk of the chancery. The official 'confirmation,' with which it was not necessary to tamper, was on the day of trial placed before the

Forgeries of Charters in Religious
Houses.

judges in the Court of King's Bench ; it was a genuine document and on the face of it sufficient to decide the case. The fraud was, however, detected—possibly because the other parties to the suit were not unfamiliar with the contrivance—and the Abbot of Bruerne was summoned before the King and Council. He appeared, and declared that a monk of his house had made the erasure, and taken the charter for confirmation entirely without his knowledge, but admitted that he could show no cause why the document and all confirmations of it should not be annulled. He was required to produce them on a certain day, when he again appeared and made the astounding statement that he had never seen the charter which had been falsified, that it had been taken away from the house by the monk whom he had named, who could not be found, and who had it in his possession, if indeed it had ever existed. With this the Court seems to have been satisfied, though, of course, the final confirmation of the charter was cancelled.

Attempts to deceive the unlettered by those who were able to read and write seem, however, to have been the natural growth of an age in which a little education made almost as great a difference between Englishman and Englishman as now exists between savage and citizen. Forgery, trickery, and corruption in every form are the offspring of a period in which ignorance rendered detection difficult, and in which violence was their most ready ally. Not only was it a common offence to counterfeit a pardon, but frauds were perpetrated by government officials for the purpose of saving an offender from trial. An unfortunate widow instituted a prosecution against the murderers of her husband. In accordance with the forms of those days, the Clerk of the

Forgeries committed by Sheriffs.

Crown directed a writ to the Sheriff of Norfolk, in which county the crime was perpetrated, and instructed him to apprehend the accused, who were eight in number. One of them was named Brode; no attempt was made to capture him, and when the writ was returned his name was not to be found there. Upon inspection it was ascertained that while the writ was in the Sheriff's possession an erasure had been made, and 'Brode' had been converted into 'Crode'—so that there was in effect no warrant for the arrest of the person who was at the head of the list of the appealed.

A very similar case occurred in the same year in Hampshire. In this there was no question of forgery, but it illustrates the difficulty of obtaining justice for any wrong—a difficulty which we happily cannot realise to our modern imaginations without taking into consideration some very remarkable details. Another widow adopted the usual course of proceeding by appeal against the murderers of her husband. One of them was taken, but when the time for his trial came round, the Sheriff certified that he was in ill health, and could not travel without danger of dying on the road. Another day was fixed, and again the prisoner was not produced and the same excuse was made. The Court, however, decided that the Sheriff was not justified in his conduct, that his return was insufficient, and that he had acted with the object of showing favour to the accused. Like the Sheriff of Norfolk, he suffered no greater punishment than a fine, which in those days of corruption he could, no doubt, easily make good.

The conduct of the Sheriffs in the administration of justice was at that time neither worse nor better than that of their subordinates, or even of the superior judges.

Partiality and general corruption of Sheriffs and other Officers.

The Sheriff of Hampshire was implicated in another affair in which the Royal authority was quietly set at defiance. A trespass had been committed; the offender had been sentenced in the Court of King's Bench to pay a certain sum, and the Sheriff had been instructed to execute judgment. Upon receipt of the writ, he deliberately refused to act. The Coroners of the county were then commanded to bring him into Court to answer for his contempt. Their reply was that the Sheriff was residing within the liberty of Queen Philippa, and that the duty of taking him devolved upon the bailiff of the liberty, to whom they had given the necessary instructions, but who had returned no answer. The Court held that this statement was insufficient, that the coroners were screening the Sheriff, as the Sheriff had screened the trespasser, and that they must be held responsible. In the mean time, however, the plaintiff in the original suit remained as completely without redress as though no verdict had been obtained.

A device commonly adopted by the Sheriffs, for the purpose of aiding the guilty or injuring the innocent, was Juries packed by Sheriffs. to empanel a jury of which the members were known by him to favour the side favoured by himself. The writ in which he was instructed to summon the jurors contained also a caution that they should not be in any way connected with parties interested in the case. But he had power to name whom he pleased, and his partiality could rarely be detected unless his nomination included persons obviously disqualified from serving according to law. Sometimes, if he could not attain his object otherwise, he would openly disregard the law, and trust to his influence to save him from punishment. But his misdeeds in this respect were not unfrequently brought to light. It was necessary, at this time, that jurors should be chosen in the district in which a crime was committed or in which a dispute arose; and it must be remembered that they were still practically witnesses of the facts, if not the only witnesses, though they gave a verdict. In spite of this, the Sheriff of Sussex took upon himself to return a panel of jurors, to try a case of homicide, not one of whom was qualified by his place of abode to sit. The defect was discovered, and the panel quashed. The Sheriff of Suffolk effected the same purpose in a manner, if possible, still more unjustifiable. He placed a number of outlaws upon a jury, which convicted an Ipswich man of trespass and other offences. The sufferer endured a long imprisonment in the Marshalsea Prison before he could obtain so much redress as an enquiry into the circumstances. In the end, however, the illegality of the proceedings was made manifest, and they were annulled.

Sometimes it is expressly stated that an accused person is too powerful for a trial in his own county to be impartial, and provision is made accordingly for a trial in London. But pressure could as readily be brought to bear upon the Judges and their officers in London as elsewhere. The Chief Clerk of the King's Bench had some connection with the Monastery of St. Paul's. He was one day within the walls of that religious house, when a Lancashire gentleman, accompanied by a servant, presented himself in great wrath. According to this gentleman's statement, the Chief Clerk had received a bribe, or a promise, of four marks, to delay proceedings in a pending action. This the complainant alleged to be to the advantage of his adversary, and, placing his hand on his knife, gave the Clerk a significant warning not to repeat the offence. His example was in the Court of King's Bench.

Corruption

followed by his servant, and the two retired with threatening gestures. This mode of dealing with an official was of course a contempt of court, and was punished by a fine; but it does not appear that the charge brought against the Chief Clerk was unfounded. There was, indeed, a commission about the same time to hold an enquiry concerning various deceptions and falsifications for which the King's Bench had become notorious, and which had caused no small scandal at Westminster and 'damage to the people.'

Nothing, however, can better illustrate the manner in which justice was sought, and the estimation in which

Forgery by Counsel : taking fees from both parties to a suit.

courts of justice were held, than the audacity with which money was taken from both sides in a suit between the Abbot of Pershore and the Abbot of Westminster. The matter in dispute was the burden of repairing and maintaining Pershore Bridge. One Geoffrey Aston declared himself 'of the counsel' of the Abbot of Pershore, and received from Adam le Clerk, on the part of the Abbot, a fee to obtain a Commission of Enquiry, and further to act against the Abbot of Westminster until the house at Pershore was exonerated. After some preliminary investigations, the cause was brought into the Court of King's Bench, to which the Sheriff of Worcestershire returned a panel of jurors. The return, however, was, either through collusion or in accordance with the ordinary laxity of proceeding, directed to Aston, to be delivered by him in the presence of the Chief Justice and other Judges of the Court. Adam le Clerk had come up to Westminster to act as might seem best for the Abbot of Pershore; and it was agreed between him and Aston that it would be best to destroy the panel furnished by the sheriff, and to substitute one of their own making. The sheriff's seal was accordingly taken off, the despatch opened, the names of suborned jurors put in the place of those named in the genuine panel, and a counterfeit seal attached to the forged document, which was then delivered into court. No sooner was this done than Aston pretended to betray his former clients, went to the Abbot of Westminster, and offered himself as counsel against the Abbot of Pershore. He was accepted, and bound himself by oath to strive in every way for the success of his new client. He received a larger fee than had been given on the other side, and a still greater sum on the day of trial. But when the cause was called, he took the part of the Abbot of Pershore, which he had good reason to know would be favoured by the jury. In the end, he was himself brought to trial for having been 'ambidexterous,' and convicted, but incurred no greater punishment than a fine. His accomplice in the forgery suffered no heavier penalty, and both remained at large to exercise their ingenuity still further.

The ecclesiastical courts appear to have been the scenes of similar iniquities. A grand jury found that three men in Holy Orders entered into a conspiracy against one John Exeter, who was residing in Northamptonshire. They persuaded a man to assist them by going in their company into the City of London, personating John Exeter, and accepting in his name a summons from the Summoning Officer of the Court of the Archdeacon. The officer thus became a witness of due service, and process was continued against Exeter, who, being in complete ignorance, made no appearance, and was consequently excommunicated. A day was fixed for the trial of the conspirators, who practised in the Ecclesiastical Courts.

Deceptions

seem to have possessed considerable influence, or the wealth which could be converted into influence. When the time came for hearing, the Justices simply ordered proceedings to be stayed.

If the judges were not guilty of corruption in this particular case, there is at least no doubt that corruption

Bribery among the Judges: the Chief Justice of England convicted. was as general among them as among the counsel from whom they were selected, and among the subordinate officials of the courts.

Not only had extortion been the theme of innumerable documents enrolled on the public records for generations; not only had the judges been dismissed in a body for their misdeeds; not only were the bribes which they were in the habit of receiving from both parties to a suit the subject of popular songs, but at the very time now under consideration the Chief Justice of England was William Thorpe, who was convicted two years later of receiving gifts from parties appearing before him. According to the Ordinance for the Justices, framed two years earlier, every judge was, upon his appointment, compelled to make oath that he would not take either robe or fee, for the execution of his office, from any one but the king; and an infringement of this solemn promise, placed his lands, and goods, and life at the king's mercy. Five separate instances in which money had been accepted were adduced against Thorpe, and in none of them did he deny the fact. The sentence pronounced against him was that he should be hanged, and forfeit all his lands and goods. The king, however, stayed execution, commanded that Thorpe should be imprisoned in the Tower, and, after a delay of no more than a twelve-month, granted a pardon, and restored a portion, if not all, of the forfeited possessions.

It is but too evident, from this and many other similar cases, that the offence which the Chief Justice confessed was not regarded as a very great crime. An oath had been broken in which the king had a special interest, and this seems to have been thought of far more importance than the character of the Bench or the welfare of the nation. A pardon, in those days, apparently cleansed a man from the stain of every mean action, and rendered him fit for the society of the most noble among barons or the most chivalrous among knights. It is necessary to bear these facts well in mind in attempting to estimate the culpability of such a Chancellor as Bacon, and the blessings which we enjoy in the present administration of the law.

Enough has now been said to show how wide-spread was the corruption of the period, and to explain the violence and lawlessness which appear at first sight irreconcilable with any firmly-established legal system. Ill effects of these bad examples. It has been sufficiently proved that the age of chivalry was an age of chicane, and fraud, and trickery, which were not least conspicuous among the knightly classes. It has been demonstrated that in town and country alike all the officers of the law, from the highest to the lowest, were open to bribery. It is not, therefore, difficult to understand how a legal organisation from which our own has been developed was wholly without respect, and utterly powerless to cope with offenders. It ceases to be wonderful that the barbarism of the past was able to assert itself in private wars and forcible seizures of land at a time when the Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer were all in existence, when the judges went their circuits as in our own time, and when legal cases involving difficult points were reported year by year for the use of the legal profession. The men appointed to carry out an improving judicial system were infected by the ancient traditions, and brought the laws into the disrepute which was justly incurred by themselves. Criminals of every kind not unnaturally believed that they would be protected in the perpetration of crime, or that they would at least secure impunity after the deed. It must have been for this reason that they undertook adventures which could not be brought to an end in a day, and which would have been perfectly impossible had the local authorities acted with vigour or even acted at all.

Not once nor twice, but time after time it is recited, in the commissions of enquiry, that after a close had been broken and a house attacked, the timber was cut down, the grass mown and made into hay, the corn reaped, and the whole spoil carried off. The knights and clerks who were implicated in these deeds mustered, perhaps, sometimes a force too powerful to be successfully opposed by any legal authority ; but at other times, when the attacking party was less numerous, it is not difficult to perceive the connivance of a sheriff or his subordinates. It is no injustice to the man who would pack a jury or rase a writ to suppose that he would shut his eyes and close his ears when a knight, who happened to be his friend, was robbing a knight who happened to be his enemy.

One of the greatest encouragements to criminals was thus the great probability that they would escape all punishment. Apart from the corruption or partiality of officials which delayed a trial or rendered it impossible, a jury, even when not fraudulently empanelled, was usually inclined to take the part of persons accused. The lament in the Statute of Winchester

Reluctance of jurors to convict.

that jurors could not be induced to find true verdicts against robbers or any breakers of the peace is fully justified by the rolls of a later date. Except when the culprits were 'clerks,' who were at this time extremely unpopular, acquittal was the rule and conviction the exception. A man of influence could exert his influence to save himself; a man of no influence had the sympathy of men who, if not concerned in the offence which they were summoned to try, could hardly have been guiltless of some similar act of lawlessness. If a man was taken with property in his possession of which he could not give a satisfactory account, it was usual to defer his trial, after he had been brought into court, until his fate could be decided by an Inquest of Fame. The meaning of this was that the general character of the accused, as found by a jury, was accepted as an indication of the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. The ancient practice of compurgation may, perhaps, have suggested this method of determining the issue, and the result was hardly more satisfactory than the result of the ancient practice. The 'country' which would not convict on a particular charge, would not, as a rule, declare a thief to be of ill repute, and the ordinary verdict was that the accused was of good fame.

Among other facilities for escape was the ease with which a law breaker could find shelter for himself and storage for his spoil. The Common Receiver is by no means a creation of our great modern cities, but has descended to us from the days when Europe was in a state of brigandage, and when the guilds assisted an accused brother to obtain an acquittal. Men and women are thus described in numerous cases recorded in the rolls, and were the fitting associates of the classes described as common breakers of the peace, common thieves or robbers, and common malefactors. There is now a wider separation between those who live by crime and those who live by honest means. But the difference has been caused not so much by the addition of crime to the list of skilled professions as by the increase in the number of industrial callings. New outlets are thus provided for the energy and ingenuity of those who would, in former times, have joined the gang of a robber-knight, earned a livelihood by forging writs and charters, or been content with stealing a sheep and carrying it home to be hidden by a wife or a mistress.

Common Receivers of felons and goods.

It happened by no means unfrequently that members of a band of depredators betrayed their accomplices after they had been apprehended. This might naturally have been expected in an age in which counsel sometimes accepted fees from both parties to a suit, and the judges were notoriously corrupt. There was, however, little danger to any criminal from this source. The spirit of partisanship, if it was not strong enough to prevent a thief from becoming an approver, was at least strong enough to render his death almost a certainty after he had made his accusation. The great number of these approvers and their almost invariable fate present a curious illustration of the age. If jurors were always reluctant to convict, they were doubly reluctant when, as the legal phrase ran, an approver offered himself. The charges brought by these men were, no doubt, very often false and prompted by malice. There was many an Oates before Titus, though their opportunities may not have been as great, or their schemes may not have been as well made known to us as his. But jurors would, in those days, care little whether an approver spoke truth

Approvers :
their usual fate : the reasons for it.

or falsehood. If any virtue was cultivated, any duty considered sacred, it was that of fidelity to a kinsman, a leader, or a comrade. Thus much of good, though little more, there was in the old family-tie, the old land-tie and the old guild-tie. To be untrue to an associate was, therefore, a crime of far deeper dye than robbery or murder ; and the jury, apart from all other considerations, had no eyes for the lesser offence in presence of the greater. Any one who was appealed by an approver, was, for these reasons, as nearly as possible certain of an acquittal ; the approver himself, if he failed, as he nearly always did fail, to obtain a verdict, was sentenced to be hanged.

Jurors, too, had probably some suspicion of the manner in which men were induced to turn approvers after they had been captured and lodged in gaol. Not many years had elapsed since some of the deeds perpetrated by gaolers in London had been brought to light, and it may be assumed that in such an age gaolers elsewhere were not more humane. A whisper had gone abroad of the horrors of Newgate, which had at length become the subject of a commission of enquiry. There persons accused of minor offences had been thrown into the deepest dungeons with notorious robbers and murderers. All had been threatened and tortured until they consented to do as the keeper of the gaol had bidden them. Sometimes his object was no other than that of the brigands outside his walls—to make his victims pay for mercy ; but not less often it was to force the most atrocious criminals to implicate the innocent in the offences which they had committed. The appeal by an approver was, therefore, on many grounds regarded with abhorrence. It might, indeed, have been supposed that, as forced by torture to become approvers.

Prisoners

an inquest was held upon the body of everyone who died in gaol, to decide whether the death had been in the ordinary course of nature or had been caused by duress, there would have been some restraint upon the cruelty of gaolers. But though there is ample evidence that the law upon this point was enforced there is not less ample evidence that death in prison was a remarkably common event. Among all the prisoners none died so frequently as the approvers, who seem, indeed, to have sometimes at least resisted their tormentors until their strength failed them and to have lived only long enough to make their charge. Instances in which 'dead' is set against the name of an approver are suspiciously common; and one roll of the year before the Black Death shows that no less than fifty had died in the gaol of York Castle alone.

With the alternative before him of being executed according to law or killed by prison discipline, it may appear strange that anyone should be found to seek safety in a false accusation or in treachery to a friend—especially in an age in which such treachery was regarded as the most unpardonable of sins. The only explanation seems to lie in the fact that, when communication was difficult and news travelled slowly, the fate of informers was not generally known, and in the fact that, although every man was ready to punish as a common enemy one who had shown himself a traitor, few had any real sense of honour, any chivalrous sentiment, which would deter them from attempting to save themselves at the expense of others.

When, however, the approver had once made his accusation, he seems to have been oppressed by the magnitude of his offence against the recognised code of morals, or to have been utterly broken in spirit by the tortures which he had endured. In

Conduct of approvers after making their accusations.

those days mere physical courage must have been the most common of virtues, and could not have been wanting in the habitual criminals whose lives were passed in rapine and bloodshed. Yet the approvers appear but rarely as the actors in the trial by duel which afforded them their best chance of success ; and, when it was demanded against them, they seem to have lost all confidence in themselves. The following instance, by no means exceptional, may be mentioned in illustration. A man taken on suspicion of having stolen a number of sheep became an approver, and alleged that he had committed the offence with others, of whom he mentioned one by name. The accused declared his innocence, and offered to prove it by his body. The court allowed the wager of battle. It was accepted by the approver who was sent back to prison. But, before the appointed day the approver returned into court, and withdrew the charge. His fate might easily have been predicted. He was at once sentenced to death by hanging.

Charges made by approvers were by no means the only kind of accusation discouraged by popular opinion. An attempt had been made, since the Conquest, to provide a legal substitute for the ancient blood-feud. Lawyers of the French and Italian schools had no sympathy with the barbarous doctrine that the next of kin had a right to blood or money for a slain relative. But they introduced into the class of prosecutions by them designated appeals a form of procedure according to which a widow could prosecute the slayers of her husband, or an heir male the slayers of his ancestor. In the event of a conviction, the king had no power to pardon ; and to this extent the family rights of past ages were respected and the injury done was regarded by appeal ;

Prosecution
impunity of criminals.

as a private wrong. There was usually in such cases a concurrent indictment in which the offence was regarded as a public wrong—done, in technical language, against the king's peace. Damages for murder were thus abolished, though damages were still awarded to those who were successful in an appeal of maihem (or maiming), and restitution of stolen property was obtained by a successful appeal of robbery or larceny. But it was hardly more difficult to secure conviction in an appeal instituted by an approver than in an appeal instituted by a bereaved widow. The lawlessness for which the ancient wer-gild was but a cloak was still dearly cherished ; and it was, no doubt, considered a great hardship that an Englishman should not have the privilege of killing a neighbour when he was prepared to make a suitable compensation. In the age of chivalry there was little sympathy for the fatherless and the widow, who learned by bitter experience that to institute a prosecution was only to add new trouble to their bereavement.

The happiest issue of which there was any reasonable hope in any kind of appeal was that the accused would escape capture and be outlawed for non-appearance. This was what most frequently happened ; and it could have afforded but little satisfaction to the prosecutors. Only a little less often it was found that on the day of trial the accusers did not dare to present themselves. It is, indeed, probable enough that in some appeals of rape and robbery accusations had been falsely made, and that a guilty conscience had a deterrent effect. But this explanation will not apply to the numerous instances in which appeals of murder were abandoned by widows who had lost their husbands. The penalty for this default would not have been lightly

Hardships suffered by injured accusers.

incurred, for it was that which in the case of a woman corresponded to outlawry in the case of a man. She was waived; she became, that is to say, a waif—a thing of as little consideration in the eye of the law as a stolen chattel thrown away by a thief in his flight. She had legally no dwelling-place save within the walls of a prison. Yet this was commonly the sentence upon a widow who had been imprudent enough to accuse her husband's murderers in the first excitement of her grief. Either the offenders employed such threats that she feared their violence more than the law's cruelty, or the neighbours were so much opposed to the proceeding by appeal that she knew it would be useless to ask for their verdict as jurors. In either case the remedy provided by law was practically useless.

If a resolute woman determined to run every risk, and appear in court, a dexterous counsel raised technical objections, by which her patience and resources were exhausted—sometimes even before the jurors were asked to speak. Walter Eye, for instance, a clerk, had to answer Mazeline le Long for the murder of her husband in one appeal, and others had to answer her in another appeal for having committed the crime with the consent and at the instigation of the clerk. Eye was tried first, and acquitted on the charge of murder. The widow was committed, and compelled to pay a fine for her release. The appeal against one of the others was then heard, and it was pleaded on his behalf that, as his principal had been acquitted, the accusation against him as an accessory necessarily fell to the ground. The court ruled that this was good law, and the widow was again committed, and again had to pay a fine. Two others failed to appear and were outlawed; but one of them afterwards came into court, and gave as a reason for his non-appearance that he had been in the army before Calais. He was bailed, and in the end received a pardon. The widow, after all her losses, had no satisfaction, and was burdened with the reflection that all her enemies, except one who died in prison, had both the will and the power to take their revenge for her attempt to punish them.

In the corruption which prevailed everywhere, and from which, as has been seen, gaolers were by no means exempt, the criminal who could afford to pay Facilities for the escape of criminals, might reasonably hope to escape from prison either before trial or after sentence. Gaol-breaking, as it is termed, is frequently mentioned in the records. The commission to enquire into the state of Newgate naturally suggests a suspicion that gaols were not very frequently broken without the connivance of some one who had authority within them. In the year before the Black Death there was a writ to apprehend the Keeper of the Marshalsea for having fraudulently permitted the escape of a number of prisoners who were in his custody, and who had been convicted of various trespasses. There is reason also to believe that the sheriffs played into the hands of the gaolers—sometimes for the purpose of detaining an innocent person in prison untried, and sometimes for the purpose of giving a favoured prisoner more time to make arrangements for his escape. Again and again it is recorded that a person brought into court for trial was sent back to prison ‘for defect of country’—as it is expressed in the rolls, or, in other words, because there was no jury. It was the duty of the sheriff to summon a sufficient number of jurors, and, though they may sometimes have neglected to obey the summons, it is quite consistent with the facts already narrated to suppose that the sheriff was willing to incur a fine for the sake of damaging an enemy or gaining time for a friend.

Had the administration of justice been less corrupt than it was, criminals would still have had a great advantage in the difficulty which presented itself when any attempt was made to describe them in a legal document. Below the class of knights, surnames had not as yet become fixed ;

Advantages to criminals from the imperfect adoption of surnames.

and it would, perhaps, be hardly correct to say that they were everywhere fixed even in that rank. If a man is known as William Litster of Gateshead, William, his servant, is known as William Williamservant Litster of Gateshead. If a man is known as Robert of the Woghes, Nicholas, his servant, is known as Nicholas Robertservant of the Woghes. It is evident that in such cases as these the trade or the place of abode is made to serve the purpose of one designation, but that each is so loosely attached as to be moveable at pleasure, and to be applicable to the purposes of another designation. The consequences of such an imperfect nomenclature are, as might have been expected, most conspicuous in the records which relate to criminal matters. The judges, from this cause, looked upon any alleged pardon with the greatest suspicion ; and there, no doubt, existed a practice of rendering a pardon granted to one person useful to many. Juries, therefore, were continually summoned to decide the identity both of persons accused and of persons pardoned. A man who was put on his trial for homicide, as John Parker, alleged that he had received a pardon under the name of John, son of Richard Smyth of Watton ; another, accused with him, as Walter of Lyn-deseye, alleged that he had received a pardon under the name of Walter Cosyn of Toynton, in Lyndeseye ; and in both cases the pardons were allowed. A question arose whether a prisoner described as Robert Stete Tournour of Tenterden had been outlawed or not; it was found that the person outlawed was Robert, son of Alexander Turnour of Thurleigh, and that the prisoner was Robert, son of William Flour of Tenterden. When there was so great an uncertainty as appears in these and very many other cases, it is obvious that there were almost insuperable obstacles to the apprehension of offenders not taken in the act, as it was nearly impossible to describe them correctly in a writ, even though their persons were known. So great, indeed, did the inconvenience become that in the reign of Henry V. it was thought necessary to provide a remedy by a Statute, in which it was enacted that the condition in life or occupation and the place of abode should be necessary to a complete description of a person in a legal document. Even this, however, was not effectual, and the Writ of Identity of name, which was commonly demanded in the reign of Edward III., was again the subject of a statute in the Reign of Henry VI.

Though pardons were regarded with suspicion when produced in answer to a criminal charge, there is no doubt that they were granted with the utmost facility in an age when peace was never of long duration. As soon as war was declared, it was the custom to issue a proclamation, in which a general pardon of all homicides and felonies was granted to everyone who would serve for a year at his own cost. The terms were readily accepted, and the king increased his force by a number of men who would perhaps be inferior to none in courage, though they might not improve the discipline of the army. The rolls accordingly

Readiness with which pardons were granted.

abound with instances in which a pardon was alleged for military service, and allowed without dispute. Nor was this the only advantage which a criminal derived from foreign wars. Even when he remained in England, in pursuit of his ordinary occupations, he had only to secure the good offices of some one who had influence with the king. An entry would then appear upon the rolls to the effect that, at the special request of some nobleman named, or of divers magnates and others serving with the king in parts beyond the seas, who testified to the innocence of the accused, a pardon had been granted to him. In such words impunity was granted to one of the actors in the outrage in Wiltshire, in which a small army sacked a manor-house, and in which two priors were said to have been among those who committed rape and murder. It is hardly necessary to remark that the representations by which these pardons were obtained were not always strictly accurate. A curious case of deception, which, from the self-denial and devotion involved, was more venial than many others, was brought to light in the year 1348. One Walter Mast was indicted for murder, and lodged in Scarborough Gaol. His brother John then joined the king's army, fought at Crécy, and during the whole campaign passed by the name of Walter. This heroic liar then asked for a pardon in the name of Walter Mast, and obtained it in the ordinary course. But as the homicide had been in gaol at the time of the battle, the fraud was too transparent, and John had to confess the deception of which he had been guilty. He threw himself upon the king's mercy, and was released, on finding sureties for his future good conduct and paying a fine.

To so great an extent, however, was carried the practice of obtaining pardons on various pretexts that, even in such an age as has been described, it was felt to be a national reproach, and became the subject of many petitions in parliament. There was no check upon it except the power of individuals to institute an appeal against the wrong-doer, and the law by which the accused, when captured, was detained for a year and a day in prison to await the private action before he was brought to trial upon the indictment. This state of the law sometimes had undoubtedly the effect of inflicting a year's imprisonment upon a criminal, or not less probably upon an innocent person ; but in other respects the appeal, as has already been shown, rendered little or no assistance to the cause of justice.

Among the crimes for which a pardon was granted in the year 1348, was one which shows how little respect there was for the services of the Church. It was convenient to one of the inhabitants of Great Yarmouth, or to his wife, that a report of his death should be spread abroad and believed. The wife devised a scheme, and employed a number of men to carry it into execution. In those days it was not very difficult to find a dead body, nor, when one was required, would there have been much hesitation in hastening the death of the living. A body was found, and represented by the wife to be that of her husband. She had removed to Lynn, where the deception could be more easily effected, and where neither the coroner nor the neighbours would attempt to identify the features of the corpse. No suspicion was excited at the time, and the body was solemnly buried as that of her husband. The fraud, however, was afterwards detected, and one of the offenders was brought into court for trial. As frequently happened, there was no sufficient jury, and the accused was sent back to prison. Before the hearing of the case he obtained his charter of pardon, and it does not appear that his accomplices were ever apprehended.

Pardon for a fraudulent burial.

The most probable motive for this false burial was the desire to stop pursuit of the person represented to be dead, and to make an end of all accusations brought against him. The device opened one more avenue of escape, in addition to the many which criminals already enjoyed. It leads, however, to a question which will have occurred to the mind of every one who has read the preceding description of the state of England—What influence was exerted by the Church in the midst of this wide-spread depravity?

One of the most common incidents in the courts of criminal jurisdiction was the claim of the accused to have Benefit of Clergy. It must have been notorious everywhere that anyone who was entitled to ^{Benefit of Clergy.} this privilege was practically exempt from the ordinary punishment for most of the greater crimes. The effect can hardly have been very edifying to the uneducated laity, who, however great their superstition may have been, had not the slightest respect for the ministers of religion. It was as likely as not that a priest could be made an accomplice in a fraudulent burial; and if he could not, there would have been no hesitation in deceiving him. Benefit of Clergy was not only one of the advantages enjoyed by a particular class of criminals, and an inducement to break the law, but was also a cause of hatred between one class and another.

The comparative impunity of clerical offenders, the lawlessness of the whole clerical body, and the unpopularity both of monks and of parish priests, are so inextrically interwoven, that it is necessary to bear each in mind in the consideration of the rest. The subject, too, regarded as a whole, has an importance of a far wider range than could have been suspected without the light thrown upon it by the records of criminal proceedings. It is only through the inner national life which is there revealed that the great religious movements of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries can be traced to their sources in the far-off past. It is only there that some of the sentiments which animated the followers of Cranmer can be identified with those which were common throughout the whole country in the days of Wycliffe. It is only there that the need of reform in the Church presents itself at so early a period as a wide-spread conviction, apart from the tenets of particular preachers—as a conviction expressed in every county, not by elaborate treatises, but by short and significant verdicts, and by deeds not less significant.

When Benefit of Clergy was successfully claimed, the accused was handed over to the Ordinary, or, in other words, to the safe keeping of the Bishop of the diocese, who usually sent a deputy to watch the proceedings in court, with power to receive clerks from the secular arm. Sometimes the clerk was given up before trial, for purgation according to the direction of the ordinary; sometimes a jury was empanelled to decide a matter of fact which affected the claim; but most commonly the trial proceeded as in the case of an uneducated layman, and the accused obtained the protection of the Church only as a clerk convict. The judges, indeed, seem to have had the power of ordering a lay jury to give a verdict, even though the prisoner

Light thrown
by the Criminal Records
upon the great religious movements of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries.

Proceedings
upon the claim of Privilege of Clergy.

might assert his clergy immediately after he was brought into court. Thus in one case in which a clerk had committed various offences, had robbed his father's house, and had claimed the privilege of his letters, the order of the court was that he should be delivered to the ordinary, but that an inquisition should first be held by the country to determine the truth of the charges, and under what description the ordinary was to receive him. He then became a clerk convict ; and the royal authority was so far maintained above that of the Church as to follow him to the Bishop's prison, where, as appears upon the record, he was to be lodged. After this stage of the proceedings the criminal was, according to the canon law, still able to exculpate himself before the Bishop by the ancient method of compurgation. He had but to make oath of his innocence, and to find others who would swear, as a matter of form, that they believed him, and he became again a free man, wholly purged from the taint of crime. This, it may well be believed, was not desired by the judges when they drew a distinction between cases which might be tried in the first instance before the ordinary, and cases in which a verdict must first be pronounced by a jury. But this, there is no doubt, was the final issue, even when a verdict of guilty had been pronounced ; and against such a miscarriage of justice an attempt was made to provide a remedy by the introduction of a clause into the form of delivery, according to which the convict delivered was expressly deprived of purgation. The instances, however, are rare in which this precaution was adopted ; and thus privilege of clergy was practically, for one class, an escape (secured by means of an oath and a fee) from every punishment for almost every felony. The clerk convict, indeed, was in a far better condition than the ordinary layman who had been acquitted ; for, by a Statute of the twenty-fifth year of Edward III., which, in this respect, probably declared the previous state of the law, he could not be afterwards arraigned for any felony committed before his conviction. When purged of the offences of which he had been found guilty, he was in the condition of a new man—blameless in the eyes of Justice, of good character from his infancy upwards.

At this early period, however, as afterwards, the definition of a clerk must have been a matter of some uncertainty. It was held by one judge as late as the year 1352 that the tonsure was necessary for a successful assertion of the claim to clergy, even though no objection to the claim was raised by the ordinary. But on the other hand, it is evident that this was not the common interpretation of the law, and that the qualification of being able to read must, in the usual practice, have been held sufficient. If not already, it was very soon afterwards, a part of the duty of the judges to enquire whether gaolers had aided prisoners to gain a knowledge of letters, and to punish them when detected in the offence. Even at the beginning of the reign of Edward I., when men in orders could not legally marry, a statute was passed by which felons were deprived of their clergy if they had committed bigamy in addition to their other offences. Bigamy, in the clerical sense, meant marriage with a widow, or with two maidens in succession—with one after the death of the other. The act could not apply to matrimony committed after orders had been taken, and could hardly have been intended to meet cases so exceptional as those of married men who had forsaken their wives for the sake of religion. The privilege had even in those days, there is reason to believe, been somewhat extended.

The class to which the privilege was allowed.

The truth seems to be that the Ordinary, if he pleased, claimed as 'clerks' all who had advanced so far in the preparation for orders as to learn the art of reading. Many tenants of the church lands, no doubt, availed themselves of the opportunity to learn letters at the nearest monastery, or, if they were in favour with the superior, were taught to read in prison and claimed at the trial. It was not until a later period that the ordinary could be compelled by the judges to accept a knowledge of letters as a proof of clerk-hood. After this change was effected in the law, the classes arrayed against each other were the educated with privilege against the uneducated without privilege; before it, the unprivileged laymen were arrayed against the privileged clergy who practically extended their protection as far as they wished and no farther.

The doctrine, that a man who had been married might have privilege of clergy if he could read, and if the ordinary pleased, not only preserved a clerk convict from punishment in his own person, but secured for him the restitution of his goods The advantages secured by the privilege. after purgation, and operated to the benefit of his heir, who in the case of an ordinary lay conviction would have been disinherited. There is a curious case on record which shows, that though the tenant of lands died in the Bishop's prison after having been convicted of felony, and even before purgation, his son was still allowed to be capable of inheriting. One John de Valoignes held a manor and various other lands. He was accused of having broken into a mill and carried off a mill-stone, and a quarter and a half of corn, and was found guilty. He claimed his clergy and was delivered to the ordinary after having been convicted, to use the language of the record, as far as the conviction of a clerk was possible. A certificate from the bishop in whose prison he had been confined showed that he had died there without purgation. The escheator, in the ordinary course, took his lands into the king's hand; the inquisition, usual after the death of a landholder, was held, in the ordinary course, to determine what were his lands, and how held, and who was his heir; the jury found, according to the ordinary course, that his heir was his son. Everything, in short, was done which would have been done had Valoignes never been convicted. But had he not successfully claimed benefit of clergy the issue would have been entirely different. The lands (unless, indeed, it could have been proved that they were entailed, which, in this case, was not even alleged) would have remained in the king's hand a year and a day after the conviction of Valoignes, and would then have escheated to the lords of whom he held. The finding of an heir by inquisition would have been of no avail to the son, for felony corrupted the blood and extinguished all rights of inheritance.

It may easily be imagined how great was the jealousy excited by such privileges in a society in which partisan-ship was regarded as a virtue. We have seen how commonly laymen were acquitted; but if it was probable before trial that a layman would be found not guilty, if it was still more probable that an approver would die or be hanged, it was almost certain that any one who could claim benefit of clergy would be convicted. In the whole of a series of rolls for the year 1348, there is hardly an instance in which a clerk who clerks always convicted when tried.

Jealousies excited by it :

was tried was acquitted; and yet the number of instances in which clerks were tried is lamentably great. Stealers of cattle, burglars, habitual robbers, homicides, men guilty of sacrilege, and of habitually receiving felons or stolen goods are all protected as clerks after having been convicted of felony. Many even of the approvers, who as laymen would have been hanged, are as clerks delivered to the ordinary, and so contribute not a little to the ill feeling excited among the unprivileged. The lay jurors consequently displayed their party spirit with a consistency which shows that the facts of each case must have been entirely disregarded; for a clerk they gave always a verdict of guilty, for a fellow layman a verdict of not guilty as often as they dared.

The antipathy to the privileged class displayed itself also in more active measures than mere verdicts of guilty. No offence appears more frequently on the rolls, or is more surely followed by an acquittal, than burglary at the house of a parson. The rectors of those days were among the very few rich men who possessed as many as half a dozen silver spoons. They did not live in castles, and their houses were easily broken. If the poor had little love for them as a class, the powerful cared little to protect them; and those among them who did not act as receivers on behalf of criminal relatives, were thus for many reasons the most common objects of attack.

The right, claimed by the Pope, of presenting or collating to bishoprics or livings which fell vacant in England, was by no means in accordance with national sentiments, as the Statutes of Provisors and Premunire conclusively prove. The extent to which the evil prevailed, and the resolute determination of King and Council to suppress it, are indicated also in various records. Innumerable warrants issued for the apprehension of persons bearing papal bulls or other prejudicial instruments, and the impugners of the king's laws, as those among the clergy were called who appealed to Rome against presentations made in England in opposition to papal inhibitions. Even the Archbishop elect of Canterbury was compelled to take an oath renouncing all expressions in papal bulls which might be prejudicial to the king in respect of the temporalities of the see.

The laity were not less eager to uphold their rights than the clergy, and the manner in which rights were upheld in these times has already been illustrated in the earlier part of this chapter. Both sides, according to custom, asserted their claims by force. While the parsonage was the object of attack by one class because it was known to contain some plate, it was the object of attack by another because the possession of it was, for a time at least, a practical settlement of an ecclesiastical dispute. Forcible entry was as good a proof of the right to present, or to hold after presentation, as of the title to a manor ; and forcible entries into churches and rectories became, as a natural consequence, the subject of many a commission, and many a pardon. The actual holders were driven out ; the place of worship and the dwelling-house were both held by an armed band. The parishioners had the edifying spectacle before their eyes for weeks and for months ; the tithes, when due, or before, were collected and carried off with as much violence as might be necessary ; and the whole parish was the scene of a private ecclesiastical war.

Forcible entries into churches : scandalous scenes.

Each party of course fought with all the weapons at its command, and in some cases the spiritual armoury was brought to bear upon the king's officers. A suit arose upon one of these disputed presentations, and the Court of King's Bench made an order against the Bishop of Exeter for a considerable sum of money. The sheriff of Devonshire received the king's writ, in which he was directed to enforce execution upon the bishop's goods and chattels. He entrusted the task to the under-sheriff, who seized many head of cattle upon one of the bishop's manors, and drove them to Exeter Castle. When the tidings were brought to the prelate, he fulminated sentence of major excommunication not only against the under-sheriff but against all the men who had acted under the sheriff's orders; and the excommunication was proclaimed in due form, at Barnstaple, by two priors and the parson of a Devonshire church. The bishop and his subordinates were summoned to answer for this act of contempt, and did in the end so far obey the law as to appear by attorney in the King's Bench. But in the meantime the whole county was thrown into a commotion, greater even than ordinary, by the scandal of open warfare between the secular and the ecclesiastical authorities.

In addition to these causes of unpopularity, there was yet another which took from the clergy the love of the indigent and the sick, who had at one time, perhaps, looked up to the Church as their only protector. Religious houses which had been founded expressly for the relief of the lepers and the poor had assumed, in some cases at least, a wholly different character. Their revenues were squandered by friars and nuns; their very lands were alienated at the caprice of the principals, and contrary to the wish of the founders. These abuses are mentioned, even in the official documents of the time, as reasons for the failing devotion of the people. Complaints against Alien Priories—the ‘cells’ or branches of foreign religious houses, which enjoyed lands in England—had been heard even in Parliament, and were prompted by a not unnatural disinclination to see foreigners absorb revenues which might have supported more deserving English. In short, there was a prevailing impression, fostered still further by the reluctance of the wealthy abbots to do so much as repair the roads which passed through their lands, that the clergy uniformly attempted to evade the performance of duties comparatively light, while the laity were overweighted with the burdens of military service and heavy taxation.

Misapplication of revenues attached to religious houses.

Like the lawless deeds of the knights, the lawless deeds of the clergy were frequently done in asserting a real or supposed right, but like them also frequently assumed a form to which not even casuistry could give any other name than crime. So many exploits of a criminal nature, in which both knights and clerks were engaged, have already been narrated, so many offences of which clerks were convicted have been incidentally mentioned, that it would be invidious to devote a very much greater space to misdeeds purely clerical. But the subject has so important a bearing upon general history, and aids so much towards a true comprehension of the times, that it would be false delicacy to omit altogether some details which illustrate the writings of Chaucer and Wycliffe, and show whence came the bitterness remarkable in the Vision of Piers Plowman.

Bloodshed was as familiar to the clergy as to any other class—not only to those who were vaguely described as clerks, but to chaplains and parsons of churches. It must be borne in mind that the materials for the present chapter are, almost exclusively, the Public Records of a single year. To those who search them conscientiously they tell a tale of which it is impossible to miss the meaning. They present the state of society as it actually was ; and the following incidents, selected almost at random, give a better idea of the age than volumes of praise or vituperation. The parson of Stockton Church was appealed by a widow for having killed her husband ; he could not be found, and was outlawed. Another parson was appealed by another widow for having been one of four who killed her husband ; two of them could not be found, and of those two the parson was one. A parson was one of three accused of another murder by a widow. A clerk convict was delivered to the ordinary after having been found guilty of killing a man on one occasion, and robbing a widow on another. The prior of St. Sepulchre's, Warwick, and one of his brother monks were also accused of homicide. The parson of Trent Church, less lawless than some of his brethren, committed a few offences then regarded as mere trespasses, for which a fine was ample punishment. A verdict had been found, with respect to a certain chantry, by a jury summoned to act under the escheator. The parson disapproved of their finding ; and, as the escheator was his friend, he had no difficulty in possessing himself of the record. He broke the seal, tore the document to pieces, and threw the fragments into the fire. He used to amuse himself by hunting without the king's licence, and by breaking his neighbours' parks when sport invited him. The Court of King's Bench condemned him to make certain payments for his plea-tures, but it does not appear that destroying a legal document was in this instance regarded as a more serious offence than poaching.

Familiarity of the Clergy with violence and bloodshed.

If the ordinary conduct of the clergy was not of a character to command the respect of the laity, the respect of the clergy for members of their own body was by no means exalted. Monks of various orders were in the habit of throwing off the religious habit when they pleased, and of wandering about the country in disguise. In the warrants for their arrest they are further described as ‘apostates, whose insolence must be repressed, who are bringing ruin upon their own souls and scandal upon the brethren of their order.’ Instances in which attacks are made by clerks upon clerks are by no means uncommon; but perhaps the best example of demoralisation in a religious house is presented by Ramsey Abbey. There, on the first Sunday after Easter, the refectory was broken open, and the silver cups and salt-cellars, the mazers, and the rest of the plate belonging to the house were carried off. When the loss was discovered, it was discovered also that three of the monks were missing, but it was never known precisely how many were implicated. Of these three only two were captured; one died in prison, the other was found guilty of burglary and robbery, and handed over to the ordinary as a clerk convict; the third, no doubt, joined one of the gangs of brigands which infested the country, and in which he found his true vocation and congenial society.

It was in such deeds as these, and in deeds of a similar character, that the lay robbers found encouragement and inspiration to perpetrate acts of sacrilege which could not otherwise have occurred in an age remarkable for superstition. Nothing, however, was held sacred by the thief, who perceived that men called holy did not hesitate to steal. Church-breaking is an offence which is by no means uncommon on the rolls of the criminal courts. At Scarborough, the chapel of the Blessed Virgin Mary was broken, the rings of gold and silver with which her image was decked were torn from its fingers, the clasps from its dress, and every ornament from its body. The very cross which was deposited in the chapel was carried off, and found in the house of a receiver. It is somewhat strange that such a crime was not regarded with any of the fanaticism which was displayed a few years later towards those unfortunate heretics whose only offence was a mere religious opinion somewhat different from that of their persecutors. In this case of chapel-breaking the ordinary course of the common law was followed; the chief offender happened to die before he was brought to trial; the accessories after the fact—or receivers—urged, as usual, that they could not be convicted as accomplices until the principal was convicted on the main charge, and they were, as usual, dismissed on finding sureties for future good behaviour.

Want of respect among the Clergy for members of their own body.

Sacrilege a common offence.

Such were the relations between clergy and laity as disclosed by the records of the year before the Black Death. At this time Wycliffe, as well as the author of Piers Plowman's Vision, and, perhaps Chaucer, were young men, and at the age at which impressions are most easily made. They saw with their own eyes those wild and lawless scenes, the faint reflection of which in contemporaneous documents may excite the wonder of modern lawyers and modern moralists. They knew how commonly forgery was practised by all who could write, how readily verdicts in opposition to facts could be obtained from packed juries, how easily judges could be bribed, how thoroughly corruption was diffused through every class. In the Vision, and in the writings of Wycliffe, it is possible also to discern the mental effects of the most terrible pestilence which ever devastated Europe. The horrors of the time seem to have given men new intensity of feeling and greater depth of thought, and to have left a shadow behind them which could not be wholly dissipated. Chaucer, as courtier, and perhaps because he was a younger man, took the humours of the time more gaily. But in the works of the three authors may be found all that is necessary to explain what the rolls leave unexplained, and to complete the historical picture of the age so far as history can render any picture complete. In them we have, as it were, a bridge connecting an old state of society with a new, and enabling us to pass freely over the gulf which at first sight appears to separate a period of religious stagnation from a period of great religious activity. There is indeed nothing remarkable in the teaching that a national affliction is a punishment for the sins of a nation; there have before and since been subtle satires like those of Chaucer, as well as bitter complaints like those of the Vision. But the period selected as the subject of the present chapter is the earliest period in the history of the world at which it is possible to see in copious and authentic records the surrounding circumstances moulding the minds of great writers.

The circumstances which moulded the minds of Wycliffe, Chaucer, and the author of Piers Plowman's Vision.

As there were apostates from some of the religious orders, it is by no means impossible that Lollardism had begun to show itself even before the Black Death had given a more serious turn to all human thoughts. The friar, according to the poets, was always welcome in the layman's house when the layman himself was absent ; and for the man who was licentious the religious garb served as a most useful introduction. As, therefore, renegades had little to gain by a mere act of apostasy—unless, like the monks of Ramsey, they carried away the plate—there is good reason to suspect that a necessity for reform was already perceived by some of the more conscientious members of the religious orders. The abbot and fellow-monks who lodged within the walls of the monastery, and the 'limitour,' or monk who held a licence to beg within a limited district, alike found that the habit of their order would, if discreetly managed, ensure for the wearer more ample fare by day, and a softer couch at night, than could be obtained without it. The courtier and the rustic have precisely the same facts to tell, though they employ somewhat different language. When Chaucer says—

“A frere there was, a wanton and a merry,
A limitour, a full solemné man,”

and when he adds,

“Somewhat he lispéd for his wantonness,
To make his English sweet upon his tongue,” the words call up the image of the libertine monk as effectually as all the coarser invective of the Plowman. The Plowman, however, is most successful in conveying the notion that the clergy, who ‘were loth to swink,’ or work, swarmed all over the land—

“Hermits in a heap
With hooked staves
Wenten to Walsingham
And their wenches after;”

and, continues he,

“I found there freres,
All the four orders,
Preaching the people
For profit of themselves.”

Their works, with the Public Records, complete the picture of the age.

It is impossible, also, to avoid the suspicion that Chaucer is quietly satirising the nuns in his description of Madame Eglantine, the Prioress. She is represented as a kindly woman, and—for the fourteenth century—most charming ; but it is not without a motive that the poet adorns her with a brooch, and that on the brooch there is a Latin inscription which is, when translated into English, ‘ Love overcomes all things.’

In Chaucer's writings, too, as in the corruptions of which the Records show that the courtiers were guilty,

The Court :
the state of education.

may be perceived the tone of the Court under Edward III. A century and a half had wrought but little external change. Such as the courtiers were at the end of the twelfth century they appeared to be even towards the end of the fourteenth. There was, however, this difference—that in the fourteenth century the Court possessed a Chaucer, and in the twelfth it had none. There had now been for more than two hundred years a class, small indeed, but ambitious, in which the males were compelled by their vocation to have a sufficient knowledge of at least two languages. The pleadings in court had been in French since the time of the Conquest ; the reports of leading cases, or year-books as they were called, beginning with the reign of Edward I., were also in French ; but most of the treatises on law, the official writs, and the greater part of the Public Records, were in Latin. The Rolls of Parliament were partly in Latin, partly in French. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary that every one who was a candidate for any legal appointment, or aspired to be a pleader, should be conversant with both Latin and French. During the first few reigns after the Conquest, a lawyer might perhaps have required no more intimate acquaintance with English than a familiarity with the technical terms of law and finance which had been in use before the time of the Conqueror. But the very adoption of those terms into the legal vocabulary aided in keeping alive a certain interest in the tongue of the subject population. The contempt implied in the exclusion of English from all the higher functions of a language was not, indeed, mitigated by a statute that it should be spoken in courts of law till Edward III. had been thirty-six years on the throne, when the distinction between Englishmen and Frenchmen, implied in the presentment of Englishry, had been abolished only two and twenty years. Before this time, however, the native speech had been so far recognised as to be thought worthy of a place upon a roll of Letters Patent, in the reign of Henry III., where a translation appears in English of a solitary document enrolled elsewhere in French. It must then have made its way steadily upwards as the development of parliamentary government brought the different classes into closer contact; and Chaucer would not have written in English had it not in his days been commonly spoken at Court.

So much of education and of mental culture, therefore, as is implied in the acquisition of three different languages was possessed by a knot of courtiers in the time of Edward III. The native heads of religious houses could speak English, and such French as Chaucer ridiculed under the name of French of the school of Stratford-at-Bow. Those of the clergy who performed religious services could patter a prayer in Latin if they could not understand it. A few monks had sufficient knowledge to translate the Latin charters of their monasteries—a few legal officials sufficient to draw out a writ, and enrol the proceedings of the courts. There must also have been some Englishmen who, from the necessities of their callings, had acquired a superficial knowledge of French, such as a Swiss courier or a German waiter, now possesses of English. The mass of the people, however, was in the densest ignorance; and in a complaint made in Parliament, concerning foreign ecclesiastics who held benefices in England, there is the clearest evidence that English was the only language generally known. It is there expressly stated that these intruders from abroad could not understand the language of the common people, and that the common people could not understand theirs. Traders of the higher class, who passed to and fro between France, the Netherlands, and England, had some education, and must have been able to speak French as well as to read the inscription on a coin. But the lower class of retail dealers, who had never been beyond sea, had no knowledge of letters, as may be inferred from the defence already mentioned of two of them, when accused of having base money in their possession. Nor, indeed, could such a privilege as Benefit of Clergy have been made to depend upon ability to read, as it was long after this time, had reading been an accomplishment possessed by any but a very small class outside the ranks of the clergy themselves.

Education, having thus for many generations been the exclusive property of a few, but having been, for those few, of a very high order, had caused a most remarkable contrast. It had developed a Black Prince who knew how to be generous to a fallen foe in the midst of almost incredible cruelties. It had developed a Chaucer, and a minute section of society which could appreciate him, in the midst of a people which was only beginning to be civilised even

Effects of the adoption of the English language by the Court.

in the principal towns. But there was no small gain when the courtier began to write in English. The ring of Chaucer's verse could not fail to be heard by Englishmen outside the court. Though it was not like the ring of the Plowman's ruder metal, it could be understood by the Plowman and his listeners, and the sounds raised by the Plowman could be understood at the court. Thus the adoption of the English language in the higher ranks was the first step towards the diffusion of that mental cultivation which had previously been restricted to a class. Thus at last, and thus only, a truly national life became possible. The Pope and the clergy had been satirised in song in the reign of Henry II., but the songs had been written in a language to which the people were strangers; if the villein hated the abbot at whom the courtier laughed, there was all the antipathy between courtier and villein which exists between men of different races speaking different languages. But when the courtier imitated the speech of the villein, and each discovered that they had, in some respects, common wants and common aims, there was already the beginning of a new state of society. Courtiers could lead villeins and townsmen against other courtiers for higher aims than the possession of manors, or even of thrones. Common speech was leading the way to free speech, common grievances to common action. Though the Canterbury Tales may seem to be wholly unconnected with the heretics of St. Giles's Fields, the circumstances which moulded Chaucer's thoughts into English were the circumstances which placed Oldcastle at the head of the Lollards. Many a generation, indeed, was yet to pass away, and many a trouble to be endured by England, before a brutal and superstitious populace could be even partially imbued with a spirit of Christian charity. Many a quarrel was to arise, many a battle to be fought, many a human being to be burnt, before the printing-press, when invented, could be brought to the aid of humanity and scatter even a few crumbs from the tables of thinkers among the ignorant and thoughtless. But national unity became possible when there was a national language spoken by prince and peasant. The bitterness engendered by conquest was softened when the conquerors learned the tongue of the conquered, and when the townsman began to feel that there was no longer a foreign master at his gates, who might any day revoke the charters granted with reluctance to English burghers. Men engaged in commerce began to be a little more confident; with confidence came an extension of trade. Some ingenious speculator abroad, perceiving the increased demand for parchment, on which alone it was the custom to write, manufactured paper as a substitute, and thus prepared a foundation, without which printing would have been useless. Such were the small beginnings of those mighty changes which the world has seen since the reign of Edward III., and which acquire new force with every movement. Before the Black Death they had gone no further than a recognition of the English language as becoming to the lips of men in every grade, an increase of wealth following upon the development of the wool trade, and a corresponding growth of town influence and strengthening of town corporations.

The reasons for the selection of the year before the Black Death to be the theme of so long a chapter as the present may be summed up in a sentence. It is a year in every way representative. By a systematic examination of its records, the state of society during a long period can be more favourably studied than by a perusal of all the chronicles from the time of Henry II. downwards. A mere narration of a few political events, a description of a struggle between opposite parties, and a catalogue of the laws which have been passed, though aids to a comprehension of the life led by our forefathers, are not sufficient to bring the actual conditions of that life clearly before us. The meagre stories of mediæval annalists, and the dry details of the Statute Book, are but the skeleton of history; the flesh and blood can be seen only in the every-day doings which appear upon the records, and which only there appear in their true proportions. As these documents were drawn up year by year, the information which they convey reproduces all those phases of human existence which came within the ken of the law courts at any given time, and is free from the distortion or exaggeration which are inevitable in the pages of the chronicler, or in any mere series of extracts. The year before the Black Death, too, closes one well-marked division in the History of England. All that the legislation of Henry II. and of Edward I. could effect had already been effected; the parliamentary form of government was established beyond all danger of overthrow, and there was nothing in the relations of England with other countries which could cause her internal condition to appear otherwise than to the greatest advantage. There were, as there had been for centuries, wars and rumours of wars, but the arms of England were almost uniformly successful, and peace was not in those days regarded as a possible blessing, nor indeed as a blessing at all.

The Year before the Black Death
a representative year: the age of Chivalry at its best.

This, in short, was the age of chivalry at its best ; neither statesmen nor lawyers could further improve the habits of the people so long as that age was to continue, because it was the highest possible development of those institutions (if institutions they can be called) which had been introduced by the destroyers of the Roman empire. Later history shows in every century the gradual decay of barbarism. Though barons were long afterwards strong enough to be king-makers, the national sentiment soon began to declare itself against the sovereign powers claimed by private individuals. The towns taught peasants the value of their labours, and attracted them from the ranks of a baron's army to the greater independence promised in the exercise of some city craft. Statutes against liveries, or in other words, against the uniforms worn by soldiers serving under petty princes, followed each other in a rapid succession, which showed, not less clearly than the Wars of the Roses, how feeble was a mere enactment against customs handed down from generation to generation. But the stronger the townsmen became, the more were all their interests opposed to knightly brigandage and lordly independence ; and when striving for their own interests, they were striving for the interests of the nation. The merchant of the fourteenth century desired peace no less than the merchant of the nineteenth ; but most of all he desired, what seemed to be least within his reach, peace and harmony within the realm of England itself. His efforts would have been hopeless had he not secured representation in the national parliament ; and long as it was before they bore fruit, it might have been still longer had not the Black Death come to his aid at a time when he enjoyed more prosperity than had been possible for him since the days of the Romans, and when feudalism was already falling into decay. The year 1348 is thus one of the great land-marks of the past as well as the year in which the old society appears to greatest advantage. It is only when we have thoroughly realised to ourselves what that society was that we can know how different is the state of society in which we live; it is only by measuring our distance from that far-off landmark that we can know how much we have advanced.

It is with difficulty that a terrible pestilence can be calmly regarded as a benefit to mankind. Yet, when mankind lived as they were living in England before the Black Death, any event which, even indirectly, tended towards a favourable change in the conditions of life must be considered a gain to posterity. For our ancestors we can only feel the deepest commiseration when we remember what they have suffered in order that we may enjoy. In those days not only were ignorance and crime in close alliance, but both were strong in their union, and were always closely attended by superstition and disease. There was no knowledge of the laws of health to give courage in meeting the plague, no sincere religion to give comfort in death or bereavement. Those who were to survive the coming pestilence were to survive horrors such as, perhaps, the world has never seen, either before or since. In the midst of bloodshed, fraud, and debauchery, and with a grovelling dread of the Unknown, they were to hear first a whisper from the East of a new malady creeping, but not slowly, ever nearer to England. If one traveller brought the news that it was in India, another was following with the tidings that it was already in Europe. The next could tell a more appalling tale with new circumstances of mystery; for he had heard that even the dull earth trembled at the approach of the Death—that sometimes it opened to swallow up whole cities, as though to anticipate or complete the ravages of a new master. The gossiping friars could soon excite the pity of their female admirers by accounts of the fate which had befallen their brethren in France—for at Montpellier, it was said, there were but seven Friars Preachers left out of a hundred and forty, and at Marseilles not one out of a hundred and sixty. Before the autumn of 1348 was ended, a rumour spread that the shores of England were already attacked by an enemy more deadly than Scot or Frenchman. If any one asked where the blow had fallen first, he received more answers than one; for the evil spread too rapidly to be traced to a single source. Here, as elsewhere, the Plague followed the course of the sun, from east to west. Where it struck it slew—not only surely, but swiftly. Many died in a few hours; few survived the third day. Ere many weeks had passed, all public and private business ceased. The judges no longer went their usual circuits, no longer sat in the courts at Westminster. Men of all ranks seemed to lose even the desire to get wealth or to keep it.

Scenes to be witnessed by the survivors of the Plague.

No rank and no occupation gave exemption from the Black Death. The clergy perished in numbers so great that the churches were commonly left without a priest to perform any of the services. The Archbishop of Canterbury, newly consecrated by the Pope, returned to England only to die within a few days after he reached London. So terrible was the mortality in the country, during the following year, that none could be found to tend the sheep and cattle, which wandered as they pleased among the corn—itsself left standing for want of reapers. The plague among men was soon accompanied by a murrain among beasts, caused, perhaps, in part by inevitable neglect; and this tells more plainly than the baseless conjectures of mediæval chroniclers, how great was the loss from the plague itself. Although heaps of carcases lay rotting in the pastures, the immediate effect upon prices was the reverse of that which it would have been had the population suffered no diminution; and live stock could be bought for less than one-half of that which had been its market value before the outbreak of the pestilence. However great, therefore, may have been the decrease in the supply of cattle, the decrease in the number of human beings who created the demand must have been proportionately far greater. But other causes, as will be shown in the next chapter, not only raised the price of all provisions in a few months to its former level, but called forth an Act of Parliament limiting the sums to be charged by dealers in provisions.

A strange variety of scenes, indeed, was witnessed by those who carried the recollection of the year before the Black Death into the stormy times which followed it. The disorganisation of a society ^{Object of the present Chapter.} most imperfectly organised, and the growth of a new system out of the decay of the old, are subjects which must be reserved for treatment elsewhere. The object of the present chapter has been attained, if it shows with sufficient clearness what was the actual condition of our forefathers in the year 1348, how insecure were their lives and their property, and how vast is the difference between them and us in manners, in sentiments, and in knowledge.

CHAPTER V.

FROM THE BLACK DEATH TO THE ACCESSION OF HENRY VII.

ONE of the invariable effects of a Great Plague is to loosen the bonds by which men have previously been held together. This was observed alike by Thucydides during the Great Plague in Athens, and by Defoe during the Great Plague in London. On the one hand is developed a recklessness which sets at nought all the conventional restraints of society, and all the natural ties of affection, and on the other hand a depth of feeling which carries religion to fanaticism. And though there was neither a Thucydides nor a Defoe to describe the Black Death, we may be certain that the operation of similar causes upon human beings was not very different in the fifteenth century from that which it was in the seventeenth, nor from that which it had been in the time of the Peloponnesian war. Those who did not faint by the way became, according to their temperaments, either more callous or more earnest than they had been before the calamity. Much of the fabric of the mediæval constitution was thus destined to crumble away when its powers of cohesion, never very strong, were weakened from within, and when it was assailed by new forces from without.

The social effects of every Great Plague.

The Black Death taught malcontents, both lay and ecclesiastical, their strength. The labourer, whether bond or free, learned the value of his labour ; the preacher who was dissatisfied with his bishop, Effects of the Black Death in England. or with the superiors of his order, learned how easy it was to obtain an audience composed of men who had other reasons for dissatisfaction. Thus an impulse was given to causes which were indeed already at work, and which would have produced sooner or later their natural effect, but the action of which might have been retarded for many generations, had no pestilence set them in motion.

The first sign of the changes which were to be brought about, was the demand of all labourers, and especially of those employed in agriculture, for increased pay. The mortality, everywhere ter- The Statute of Labourers. rible, had been greatest among the labouring population. When the supply of labour was diminished, its value of course became higher. Employers began to compete for it, and to offer new terms. Workmen, discovering their own worth, raised more and more the price which they asked for their services. With labour all kinds of goods, and especially provisions, became dearer ; and Parliament, in alarm at what seemed a subversion of the ancient order of society, passed the famous Statute of Labourers, by which the employed were forbidden to receive, and the employers to give, more than had been paid for labour before the Plague, and dealers in provisions were restricted to prices which the lawgivers considered reasonable.

In this statute is the first legal recognition of the fact that the feudal system could not include all the rural population in its grasp. Two classes of labourers are mentioned—those who owed, and those who The bond and the free.

did not owe obedience to a lord—the bond and the free ; and as those who held by a free tenure and tilled land of their own were not included in the provisions of the Act, it is clear that there had grown up a class of men, nominally at least free, and yet without any definite means of support. This is further made apparent by a very stringent clause against giving alms to beggars able to work.

The origin of the lowest grade of free-men has afforded a subject for the dissertations of many historians, and is necessarily obscure in proportion as our earlier history is incomplete. Sketch of the history of villenage. When Southern Britain was conquered by invaders from beyond the North Sea, most of the natives who were not slain, or who did not find refuge in towns, must have submitted to be, under one name or another, the slaves of their conquerors. At a somewhat later period, when land became the property of individuals, and none was common to a tribe, the dependence of the smaller holders upon the greater reduced the weaker freemen to a condition not very widely distant from slavery. In an age so brutal as that before the Norman Conquest, none could have enjoyed the lord's protection unless he was content to do the lord's bidding, whatever it might have been. A refusal could easily have been avenged by an accusation involving a heavy pecuniary penalty, which the accused would have been unable to pay, and which would have reduced him to the condition of a slave. Once made a slave, the refractory churl could be sold and shipped off to Ireland, or to any other country in which Christianity was professed.

When Domesday Book was compiled, a distinction was observed between the slave and the villein—the one probably representing the actual slave originally made in war, the other the churl, who held a plot of land, but who was compelled to perform services, either fixed or uncertain, for his lord. It has often been asserted that these two classes were subjected to a harsher rule after the Norman Conquest than before, but there is not a tittle of contemporary evidence in support of that proposition. On the contrary, one of the most remarkable of the Conqueror's laws is that in which the exportation of slaves is prohibited ; and the exportation appears to have ceased from that time forwards. In the benefits of this law the churls or villeins participated as well as the slaves, because the prospect before them, should they have the misfortune to be reduced to actual slavery, was by no means so dark as when they might have been carried off, like sheep, to a foreign country. Indeed, it is doubtful whether penal slavery was a recognised institution after the Conquest, and it is certain that the institution did not long survive.

Improvement
in the condition of slaves
after the Norman Conquest.

To close the market against the foreign purchaser was necessarily to diminish the value of the slave in England. Human beings born in slavery must have increased in number at a far more rapid rate than before ; they must have become at once more difficult to watch, and less worth the trouble of watching. Before the Conquest the runaway slave might fear to see a slave-dealer in every man he met ; after the Conquest it was not the interest of anyone, except of his owner, to pursue him. His greatest danger lay in the old laws concerning strangers, and in the duty imposed on the sheriff to send him back to the place whence he came. But it was possible for him to find employment in the towns ; and, at the worst, he might meet a welcome among becomes an inferior villein.

The slave

some of the bands of outlaws, who could not then export him. Thus at a very early period after the Norman Conquest the name of slave disappears, and the lowest ranks of men in the rural districts are called villeins. It is true that there was a legal difference between the villein in gross, whose bondage was to the person of the lord, and the villein regardant, whose bondage was to the land, and who could be sold only with the land which he held in villenage. In the deeds relating to the sale of villeins, it is declared sometimes that the land is conveyed with the villein who occupies it, sometimes that the villein is conveyed with his goods and chattels, and all his following or issue; and in the latter case his value seldom exceeded four pounds of the money of those early times. But documents of either kind are rare; the villein regardant passed with the manor when it was conveyed, and he was not necessarily mentioned in the conveyance; the villein in gross was but very seldom sold by himself. The distinction between the two classes was necessarily very faint, because whenever, as must commonly have happened, the villein in gross was permitted to till a plot of land, and his children tilled it after him, their position was practically that of villeins regardant, and was little likely to be disturbed.

At the time at which the Statute of Labourers was passed, the descendants of the men who had, before the Conquest, been slaves saleable in a foreign market belonged to one of three classes. Some of them were villeins rendering base services to a lord, and acquiring a prescriptive right to the land on which they were permitted to dwell; some were townsmen prospering as members of a craft-guild, or earning a livelihood by one of the many occupations to be found in every

The villeins not the only labourers.

town ; some were, perhaps, in turn, brigands and agricultural labourers—now robbing a merchant on his way to a fair, now receiving wages from steward or farmer, who asked few questions when grass was to be mown, or corn reaped, now begging on their way to the head-quarters of their gang.

Among these three classes, the villeins felt the hardships of their lot more keenly than the others, and the Statute of Labourers added to their discontent. Their lords had, according to the act, the first claim to their services ; but where there was a dearth of labour they were to serve other masters as soon as their lord's work was done. They were to be paid apparently at the rate fixed by the statute ; but according to the strict letter of the law, their earnings were not their own but their lord's. In many cases, no doubt, and perhaps in the majority, they were, as a favour, permitted to retain the money which they were able to make after the lord's dues had been rendered ; but the lord's power of seizure was none the less a reality and must have been a subject of bitter reflection to the villein and to all his household.

Discontent among the villeins : its causes.

The spectacle, too, of freemen working in the same field and secure from the claim of every lord after they had received the reward of honest industry, must have added a new sting to the sense of injury which is never absent from the bondsman. Not only was there a roving class among whom the first title to freedom was the flight of some ancestor to a town, or his reception into a gang of robbers, but there were men who had in their own persons, or in those of their forefathers, been freed from villenage in due form of law, and whose origin was neither higher nor lower than that of the men still condemned to bondage. Even before the Conquest freedom was sometimes granted to a slave; and in the year 1338 Edward III. empowered commissioners to liberate the villeins of the crown manors upon receipt from them of a certain sum of money. There is an appearance of liberality in this permission to the villeins to redeem themselves, when the amount of their ransom belonged already to the king as their lord. But coin is easily concealed, and a sudden demand upon all the royal villeins for all they possessed would have been a dangerous exercise of cruelty and power even in the fourteenth century. When, therefore, the king's necessities compelled him to take the money of his bondsmen, the most prudent course was to give them their liberty in return. Other lords did likewise, and thus the class of inferior freemen was continually growing, and by its presence aggravating the discontent of men who were not yet free.

Growth of a class of free
labourers.

The Black Death, and the Statute of Labourers which followed it, though they did not immediately cause a rebellion, yet rendered a rebellion inevitable whenever a favourable opportunity should present itself; and a rebellion was in those days certain to be accompanied by most atrocious crimes. Even the strong arm of Edward III. barely sufficed to keep back the coming tumult. A re-enactment of the statute, and commissions to enforce it, were of little avail against an increasing competition for labour to which a new impulse was given by a recurrence of the pestilence in the year 1368. Edward, who from his success in war commanded the respect of all classes, and who was not wanting in the arts which win popularity, ended his reign in comparative tranquillity. Neither he nor his advisers

The coming changes accelerated by the Plague.

knew that in attempting to limit prices by law they were committing themselves to an impossible task. To them it seemed a part of good government to maintain all the old land-marks of society, and they perhaps deluded themselves into the belief that they were succeeding in their aim. But when the sceptre dropped from the hand of a vigorous man into that of a weak boy, everything was ripe for an outbreak ; and it was not long before the outbreak came.

Beneath the already ruffled surface of villenage there had been a subtle influence at work which rendered the storm doubly formidable. Discontent with the existing religious institutions was not confined to the laity, but showed itself openly among those monks whom the law termed apostates, as well as among some of the secular clergy. With perfect good faith, no doubt, but with a zeal which the times rendered dangerous, these religious reformers preached against the existing state of society, and deduced from the Scriptures the doctrine that all men are equal. Nor did they restrict themselves to the maintenance of this principle in the abstract. They possessed what was denied to most of the villeins—the arts of reading and writing ; and they could translate with more or less accuracy a Latin record into English. Transcripts of Domesday Book were procured for the villeins, whose advisers assured them that in these documents they had proof of the freedom enjoyed by their forefathers at the time of the Norman Conquest, and that freedom was their birthright, not only according to the laws of God and of reason, but also according to the law of the land.

They were accelerated also by religious discontent.

In the very first year of the reign of Richard II., the villeins in all parts of the country, acting apparently on a preconcerted plan, refused to do the bidding of their lords. When threatened with punishment they exhibited their transcripts of Domesday, declared themselves free, and banded themselves together in threatening array. Parliament immediately passed an act declaring that the interpretation put upon the passages in Domesday by the villeins was false, and that the transcripts should be of no avail to any one who produced them in evidence. All refractory villeins were to be committed to prison without bail if their lords should so desire. Thus the semblance of a legal claim was met by the semblance of a legal enactment ; but a statute denying the right of a subject to justify himself by reference to the most venerable legal document in the realm was in itself so unjustifiable and raised so great an outcry that it was repealed in the next year. The question of law remained undecided, but the lords and their bondsmen prepared, after the manner of the time, to settle the dispute by force.

Claim of the villeins to be free.

An attempt to show from Domesday Book that the lower ranks generally were in an inferior condition, at the accession of Richard II., to that which they had enjoyed at the time of the Conquest, was necessarily foredoomed to failure. At the earlier period there were slaves in the land liable to exportation until the Conqueror forbade the practice ; at the later period even a villein in gross was seldom or never removed from one part of England to another. It might, however, have been quite possible to prove that a particular plot of land, held nominally by a freeman when the Great Register was compiled, was held in villenage under Edward III. But such a fact, even if demonstrated, was not of itself sufficient evidence that the tenant had suffered

Legal aspect of their case.

any wrong in the eye of the law. Penal slavery had become extinct, but it was still possible for a freeman to become a bondsman according to due legal process ; and even as late as the reign of Henry VI., a collector who had been appointed by the Bishop of Durham, and whose payments had fallen in arrear, entered into a recognisance to become a bondsman unless he made good the deficiency before a given day. To adduce a single document as a bar to the claim of the lord was therefore as useless as it would now be to assert a claim to land on the ground that it had been held by a remote ancestor, and to disregard all intermediate conveyances. The true title of the villein to be called a freeman lay not in ancient writings nor in legal quibbles, but in his value to the state and in the changed circumstances of the times. To seek for precedents in remote antiquity is, if the search is indefinitely continued, to bring back as models for civilised men all the customs of savages. The hopes of mankind lie not behind them but before, not in prescription but in progress.

At the very time when the sense of political wrong was inflamed by discontent with ecclesiastical institutions, the primacy was united with the chancellorship in the person of Archbishop Sudbury. It was believed, rightly or wrongly, that a poll-tax on all persons of the age of fifteen years was imposed by Parliament at his suggestion. Taxes were usually farmed out, and collected, with all the roughness and ruthlessness which marked the times, by the farmers or their agents. False claims and every form of corruption had been the subject of complaint and enquiry from the earliest reigns of which any records have remained. But when a proof of age was required for the girls of every household, the collectors, who, like their betters, were filthy-minded and brutal, received, as it were, a legal authority to offer the coarsest of insults to the most innocent of maidens. They took care to avail themselves of the privilege, and in some instances, when the father of the family happened to be present, paid the penalty of their pruriency with their lives. The whole of the population below the rank of freeholder or burgher received the provocation which was hardly even needed to force them into revolt. One cry resounded throughout the whole of England : Down with the tax—death to the Archbishop !

The passions of the lower classes inflamed by the Poll-Tax.

The grievance of the tax, when added to the grievance of bondage, was sufficient to convert a number of local riots into a general rebellion. The men of Kent were soon on the march ; the men of Essex marched too, in a separate column, on the opposite side of the Thames ; and the commonalty of the neighbouring counties on either hand hastened to join the rebels. At Maidstone, the Archbishop's gaol was attacked, and John Ball, a preacher of the new school, who had been imprisoned for teaching false doctrine, was released, and appointed chaplain to the insurgents. The leading spirits were Thomas Baker, Wat Tyler, Jack Straw, and a few others whose names betokened their callings. On the Kentish side of the river, however, the chief actor was Wat Tyler, by whose name the rebellion is generally known. He led his men to Blackheath, their numbers increasing every hour, and swollen at last by the London apprentices, who were as pleased as the villeins with the preaching of John Ball, and who believed that no satisfactory answer could be given to the question—rebellion.

Wat Tyler's

When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman ?

There was no force near London strong enough to meet the rioters, who were for a time able to dictate their own terms. Their objects, apart from the extinction of villenage, which was the chief article Aims of the rebels. insisted on, are vaguely stated by the contemporary chroniclers, who seem to have had but little sympathy for them. The abolition, however, of some monopolies with respect to buying and selling, enjoyed by town corporations, the right of every man to rent land at fourpence an acre, and to take fish and game wherever he could find it, and the reform of ecclesiastical abuses, seem to have been the chief points at which those who knew their own minds were aiming. But, even in more civilised times, the original cause of a rebellion is forgotten in the heat of tumult, and an indiscriminate thirst for blood takes the place of a desire for redress ; in an age of ignorance and brutality the horrors of mob-rule are almost indescribable. It was the ignorance of the age which had made Wat Tyler master of London, which was yet to prompt a petition of the landholders that no villein should be taught to read, which was to be modified only in the long course of years, and which is not annihilated even in the nineteenth century.

From specific complaints the rioters advanced to the general proposition that all laws were unjust, and that all lawyers ought to be killed. It followed, of course, that no man could be justly imprisoned. London in the hands of the mob : slaughter of the lawyers. The Marshalsea prison was soon broken open ; the inmates of that, and, no doubt, of the other gaols also became recruits in the ranks of the mob. So bitter was the feeling against all who were in any way connected with the law, that they were beheaded whenever they were met ; and, when their houses were stormed, it was said even the oldest men among the rebels showed the agility of rats and the endurance of men possessed. The Temple, as being the head-quarters of the enemy, was burned, with all the priceless manuscripts it contained.

Fire and sword were carried from one end of London to the other. With a not ill-founded suspicion that all legal documents were on the side of the old-established order of society, Wat Tyler and his men broke open the buildings in which it was known that muniments were stored, and gave them to the flames. At Clerkenwell, where stood the Priory of St. John of Jerusalem, the work was so well done, that little remained but the bare walls of the church. The prior, Robert Hales, who was also Treasurer of England, possessed at Highbury a manor which he had converted, according to the notions of those days, into a second Paradisc. Where they had found a paradise, the mob left only desolation and ruins. The most magnificent dwelling-house in England was that of the Duke of Lancaster—the Savoy Palace. It had but recently been built and stored with every known kind of treasure—with jewels and plate, with books and charters, and with apparel which could not be surpassed in the palace of any king in Europe. Against the Duke the insurgents at this time bore a special grudge—bred of disappointment. He had, to a certain extent, supported Wycliffe; they had been deluded, by some recruits from the north, into the belief that he had freed all his villeins, and, in the enthusiasm of the moment, they had declared that he should be their king, just as they had declared that John Ball should be their primate. Before they reached of documents and treasures.

Destruction

London, however, they were undeceived; and, in the bitterness of their wrath, they declared that they would have no king bearing the Duke's name—John, they marched to the Savoy, battered down its walls, and burned all its precious contents. A gang of them entered the cellars and remained there, drinking and making merry till the falling masonry had blocked up every outlet. The cries of these self-made prisoners were, it is said, heard for seven days, but neither their enemies nor their comrades made any effort to rescue them.

Not only in the Savoy did drink flow freely. Where it was to be had it was taken—with the consent of the owner or without. The men who were already brutal enough became still more brutal Brutal orgies of the mob. as they drank. Private vengeance was gratified as well within the ranks of the rioters as without, and rioter slaughtered rioter as he lay helplessly drunk or insensible. The apprentices, who seem to have regarded all masters as enemies, beheaded them whenever an opportunity presented itself. Wealth was regarded as a cause of offence; the more wealthy a trader was, the greater was the danger to his life; to be rich, and to have advanced money on the security of any tax, was certain death. One of the most prominent merchants in London was one Richard Lyons, who had been a farmer of subsidies and customs, and had been accused in parliament of bargaining with Edward III. in a manner disadvantageous to the country, but profitable to himself. He had been thrown into prison, and his property had been seized; but the sentence had been reversed, partly, as was commonly believed, through the influence of Alice Perers, the mistress of Edward. Upon this unfortunate man, who does not appear to have been guilty of any more heinous offence than that of engaging in the ordinary mercantile transactions of the time, the mob fell with more than their ordinary fury. They visited upon him the sins of the collectors, tore him from his house, dragged him through the streets into the open country, and murdered him at last in a hedge.

A common remark at the time was that the rebels always cut off the heads of their victims. It is a com-

Imitation public executions; fate of the Archbishop of Canterbury

mon remark in our own days that great crimes always produce imitators. The beheading and quartering of traitors had, no doubt, produced its effect upon the imagination of all classes.

To imitate the public executions with which they had grown familiar by report, if not through their own eyesight, was one of the first impulses of the victorious mob. They were in power, and they regarded their enemies as traitors. They had vowed vengeance against Sudbury, the Primate and Chancellor; and their vengeance could not be satisfied except by such punishment as kings considered meet for rebellious subjects. He had taken refuge in the Tower of London, together with Sir Robert Hales, the Treasurer, who, like himself, held a lay and an ecclesiastical office, and with some subordinates whom the mob hated for the part they had taken in the collection of the poll-tax. The rioters besieged the Tower, and it was observed, alike by the chroniclers and the song-writers of the day, that the gentlemen appeared to have lost heart, and did not fight as became them. Through lack of courage or of management, the Archbishop, the Treasurer, and five others, fell into the hands of the besiegers, and were dragged to the block on Tower Hill. There they met the fate which others had undergone and were yet to undergo, with only a little more pretence of legality, at the hands of the executioner. As the heads fell, after the blows of the axe, they were fixed upon pikes and poles, raised aloft, so that the features might be recognised, and carried in triumph before the yelling victors. The procession was one with which the neighbourhood was already, and was yet to be, only too familiar. It ended at London Bridge, where the bleeding heads were set on high for all the world to see.

The rebellion, which had hardly been less formidable in other parts of the country than in the home counties, was at length suppressed, but only after pro-^{Immediate effects of the rebellion.} mises had been made by the young king, which parliament afterwards refused to ratify. The villeins dispersed, supposing themselves to be free-men; they returned home only to find themselves villeins as before. Many of them were punished by the very death which they had themselves inflicted on others. Tresillian, the Chief Justice, who tried them, is said to have shown as little mercy to them as they had shown to the lawyers; and all who were accused before him were executed with the severity which by law was due to the crime of high treason. Villenage was destined to die out rapidly through the increased value of labour and the demand for labour in the towns; but the immediate effect of Wat Tyler's insurrection was to increase the exasperation of class against class. The rioters had shown what men persistently kept in ignorance can do in a brutal age when driven to desperation. The young king, though he had behaved with great courage, had shown that even kings may, under pressure of circumstances, promise that which they have no legal power to perform.

With a rankling sense of injury, the oppressed classes seem to have looked for consolation in the new religious tenets, which had already made progress among them. Wycliffe, in translating the Bible, had, as his adversaries maintained, thrown pearls before swine. The few who had acquired the art of reading and could procure a copy, were thus, to a certain extent, enabled to expound the words of Scripture to their fellows, and could, no doubt, draw a very effective contrast between the state of society actually existing and that which ought to exist according to the law of God.

Had the higher ranks of the clergy taken a less prominent part, at this time, in political affairs, it is possible that what was called heresy would have been more easily suppressed, and the ecclesiastical organisation would have been in higher favour. But whenever there was any great political scandal it was more probable than not that a bishop's name would be mentioned in connection with it. An instance, by no means singular, of the charges which were rife against the great dignitaries of the Church, may be found not in the words of a prejudiced Lollard, nor in the vague sentences of a pompous chronicler, but in the more trustworthy records of the Parliament and the Chancery. William of Wykeham, bishop of Winchester, who is best known to posterity as the munificent founder of the great Public School at Winchester, and of New College at Oxford, held a number of high offices under Edward III. He was Clerk of the Privy Seal, Chief of the Secret Council, Governor of the Great Council, and, at one time, Chancellor. For eight years he was entrusted with the administration of the whole of the revenues of the kingdom, and received on behalf of the king the ransoms of the King of Scotland and the King religious discontent.

Progress of

Charges against William of Wykeham and other bishops.

of France. More than eleven hundred thousand pounds passed through his hands during this time, and it was alleged that nearly the whole of this vast sum, besides French coin, had been diverted by him from its proper receptacle—the royal Treasury. It was said that he had, against the express instructions of the Black Prince, released a number of distinguished French hostages, in order to make a profit for himself. Accusations of a more precise nature were made against him of having remitted fines due to the king from certain persons and for certain offences ; but the most disgraceful of all was that he had, for a bribe, tampered with the Chancery Records, and so defrauded the king of half the dues upon a licence of alienation, of which also the particulars were given. Judgment was given against him by members of the Great Council ; and the temporalities of his bishopric were seized into the king's hands. Then followed a transaction discreditable alike to king and to subject. The bishop undertook to supply the king with three ships, to send fifty men-at-arms and fifty archers on board each ship, and to pay them, according to the king's scale of pay, for a quarter of a year. For this service he recovered the temporalities of his see, and afterwards, in the revolution of the political wheel, he obtained a full pardon and exoneration from the services which he had undertaken to render to the state.

Whether William of Wykeham was guilty of forgery and peculation, whether the Bishop of Norwich was rightly condemned in parliament for having traitorously received money from the French, whether the charges which were brought against almost all public men by their adversaries were true or false, can never be known with certainty. The men who were

Tone of morals among public
men.

convicted or acquitted upon insufficient evidence in the fourteenth century cannot be tried upon sufficient evidence in the nineteenth. But it matters little to those who would form a true estimate of the times whether all men in power were dishonest, or all political parties were in the habit of making false accusations against their opponents. The general tone of morality is the same in either case ; those who would be base enough to ruin an enemy, by pronouncing him guilty of a crime which had never been committed, would be base enough to commit that very crime when they had the opportunity. It was in an atmosphere of unscrupulous intrigue, of restless ambition, of pitiless hatred, of treachery, of dishonesty, and even of murder, that the leaders of the day drew the breath of life. The commons grew familiar with proclamations in which every well known name was brought before them as the name of a criminal ; and among the best known names were the names of the bishops. Only a few months before the temporalities were restored to William of Wykeham, Edward III. entered upon the fiftieth or jubilee year of his reign. The event was celebrated by a general pardon of felonies committed before the beginning of the year. But the one person whose offences were at that time declared to be unpardonable was William of Wykeham ; and it was expressly provided that he should ‘ nothing enjoy of the said graces.’ As soon as the old king was dead and a minor was on the throne, the bishop’s deeds were no longer unpardonable, but pardoned. What a theme for the discourse of a Lollard preacher !

The part taken by the clergy in political affairs, together with certain other practices, was also leading political discontent still more directly towards an alliance with religious discontent, and preparing the way for the execution of heretics. The religious corporations were in the habit of acquiring to themselves the revenues of parish churches by a process which was happily termed Appropriation. An advowson could then as now be bought ; the owners of advowsons could then more easily than now be persuaded to part with their property in exchange for masses or other spiritual benefits. No sooner had a monastery, a prebend, a bishopric, or a half religious half military order attached a benefice to itself, than it became perpetual parson of the church, with a right to the tithes and the glebe. It appointed a vicar to perform the religious services, paid him as it pleased, and retained the surplus in its own hands. The consequence was that the vicars grew dissatisfied, because they had not a sufficient allowance for their support, the secular clergy felt aggrieved when they saw a monk in a pulpit which they regarded as their own, and the poor complained loudly that they were deprived of what was legally their due. It had been the law in England, as elsewhere, long before the Conquest, that a fourth and afterwards a third of the tithes should be devoted to the poor ; and in this ancient maxim may perhaps be found the germ of parish relief. But the ancient constitution of society was such that the old rule could never have had much practical value, except so far as the poor were members of the ecclesiastical body. The Statute of Labourers, however, with its stringent provisions against beggars, and still more a Statute passed in the year 1388 for the suppression of mendicancy and vagrancy, with the increase in the number of free-men who had no settled occupation, naturally led men to enquire how those who were starving ought to be fed. The ill-paid vicars and the apostate monks, no doubt, knew well enough the letter of the old law ; if they wished for sympathy, they and all the teachers of the new doctrines, had but to point towards the stateliest building at hand, and to tell their hearers that an Abbot or a Prior within—an alien, too, perhaps—was growing fat on the goods which belonged to the commons, while the commons themselves were dying of hunger.

Appropriations ; the clergy, the tithes, and the poor.

Songs, more vigorous than delicate, were composed and sung from village to village, and their themes were, like that of Piers Plowman's Vision, the vices and rapacity of the clergy. The luxury of the prelates, who rode out with escorts such as were the escorts of kings, the greediness of friars, who became dealers in wool, and dishonest in their dealings, the incontinence both of monks and of the secular clergy, who squandered their gains in decking their mistresses, the absurdity of image-worship, and the good deed done by some Wycliffites, who beheaded the image of St. James, were the common topics of the songsters and rhymers. The practice of kidnapping the children of wealthy parents, in order that their inheritance might become the property of a religious order, was the subject not only of a political poem, but of a complaint in Parliament. Even the courtiers, and those who had no sympathy with the Lollards, denounced, like John Gower, the corruptions of the Church ; and when the king asked for money the Commons suggested that it should be taken from the religious houses of aliens.

Against this formidable agitation the clergy could bring most powerful engines to bear. They said little in defence of the ecclesiastical system, which it was their interest to uphold, but much of the speculative doctrines which were an essential part of the teaching of the

Agitation against the clergy : popular songs.

agitators. Superstition was as yet but little weakened ; and it was not difficult to impress those minds which had given no attention to the new belief with the notion that a doubt concerning the Real Presence, or the efficacy of penance, pilgrimages, and image-worship, was a crime fraught with the most terrible consequences, both spiritual and temporal. The Church, too, was still a great power in the state, and when Richard II., a weak sovereign, was succeeded by Henry IV., a sovereign whose title was disputed, the king could not, without great danger, have appeared positively hostile to the clergy. While, therefore, the repeated protests of the Commons in Parliament against ecclesiastical abuses could not be set at nought by the House of Lancaster, which had gained some popularity through affecting a desire for reform, the wishes of staunch churchmen were not without their weight. Hard pressed on either hand, Henry IV. discovered a middle course by which, perhaps, the throne was saved for him and his son. He gave to both sides a portion of what was asked. On the one hand he assented to a re-enactment and extension of the statutes against accepting papal provisions, and to the petition of the commons that in cases of appropriation one of the secular clergy should be appointed vicar. On the other hand, he permitted the clergy to do their worst against all whose doctrine was erroneous, and aided them by giving a sanction to a new statute, which rendered the burning of heretics easier. Henry V. adopted the same policy ; and the first year of his reign was remarkable for two most dissimilar events—the suppression of Alien Priories and the accusation of Sir John Oldcastle.

The clergy denounce the crime of heresy: policy of Henry IV. and Henry V.

It has been held by lawyers that the writ for ‘the heretic’ existed at the common law before this time, but issued only by special warrant from the king. The punishment of burning, in its worst form, was certainly inflicted long before the Conquest, and it may possibly have been applied to heretics before the reign of Henry IV. But heresy rarely appeared in England before the fourteenth century, and, except in the case of the Paterines (who, though not burnt to death were not less cruelly punished), it is difficult to find an instance even of a contumacious heretic. It is still more difficult to find an instance of a relapsed heretic, to whom the stake was considered specially appropriate. Nor would it be profitable to discuss, as many historians have done, the questions whether Sautre perished by a writ which Henry IV. had no legal power to sign, and whether the statute which required sheriffs by virtue of their office to commit heretics to the flames, upon the command of the diocesan, was invalid through want of assent from the Commons. To those who have followed this history up to the present point, it will appear idle to look for a nice consideration of technical details at a time when the papacy was trembling, and a dynasty was in danger. All we know, and all we need know (whatever may be the legal aspect of the matter to a modern constitutional or ecclesiastical lawyer) is that the ecclesiastical party triumphed when victorious in doctrine, just as one political party triumphed in turn over another, and executed its adversaries—sometimes, perhaps, according to law, sometimes certainly in spite of it.

The first to suffer for the crime of heresy in this new persecution was William Sautre. He is described, in the writ for his execution, as ‘sometime chaplain.’ According to the same document, he had fallen into a ‘most damnable’ heresy, had abjured

Execution of Sautre.

it, and had afterwards relapsed. Sentence was, therefore, passed by the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, that he should be degraded from all ecclesiastical rank, and that he should be left to the secular power—Holy Mother Church having no further concern in the matter. The king, being zealous for justice, and true to the Catholic faith, wishing to defend Holy Church, to root out all heresies, and to visit with condign punishment all convicted heretics, directs his commands to the mayor and sheriffs of London. He informs them that, according to law, and the canonical institutions, such heretics ought to be burnt with fire. He requires them, therefore, to cause William Sautre, who is in their custody, to be carried to some public place within the liberties of their city, to be put into the fire, and there burnt to death, as a manifest example, to excite the horror of Christians. Sautre died, as too many were yet to die, a martyr in the literal sense of the word—a witness to the hideous barbarism of the age in which he lived.

Other burnings followed, and the English populace seemed for a time in danger of becoming as familiar with the shrieks of burning heretics as with the bleeding heads and quarters of beheaded traitors. Writs for the arrest of Lollards were sent into every county, and many, whose names are unknown in history, no doubt perished, if not in prison or at the stake as heretics, upon the gallows as traitors.

Arrest of Lollards throughout the kingdom.

With such questions as have agitated controversial writers upon religion, this history has no concern—with questions whether this heretic recanted, and the other asked for mercy, whether the execution of one was a little more or a little less legal than the execution of another. The one important fact must always remain, that the clergy desired the death of heretics by fire, and that there was not sufficient humanity in the kingdom to raise an outcry against such cruelty. The only protest which was made, or was said to have been made, was that which was natural to the age—an attempt on the part of the persecuted to escape from their persecutors by force.

The most distinguished member of the heretical, Lollard, or puritan party, was Sir John Oldcastle, one of the very few men in the position of land-holders who went even so far as to adopt openly the opinions of Wycliffe. He was pronounced a heretic in an ecclesiastical court, and he was afterwards sentenced to death by Parliament, not only as a heretic but as a traitor. The proceedings were of an unusual character, and it has been suspected that Oldcastle suffered through a forged record of indictment and process of outlawry

A charge which, if proved, might implicate a number of the chief personages in the land in a conspiracy to crush by fraud one whom there could have been little difficulty in crushing by force seems, at first sight, hardly to demand investigation. But as it is one of the rare cases in which the evidence can be brought before those who live in the nineteenth century as clearly as before those who lived in the fifteenth, there is some temptation to put so important a matter to the proof. An indictment, in which Oldcastle's name is mentioned, is enrolled on the judgment roll of the Court of King's Bench. In the same indictment appear also Walter Blake of Bristol, chaplain, and Roger Acton, of Shrewsbury, knight. Oldcastle's name stands first, and there is not the slightest doubt that it has been written upon an erasure. The parchment has for a space of more

Sir John Oldcastle.

Oldcastle's indictment as enrolled in the King's Bench—the erasures.

than two lines been scraped, it shows the roughness which always follows abrasion, and when held up to the light, it is seen to be obviously thinner in the suspected part than elsewhere. The two lines are written in a hand which, though strictly contemporaneous, is different from that which precedes and follows, and with ink which is considerably lighter. Nor is this all. In another part of the document, in which Oldcastle's name occurs incidentally in the original hand, the word 'said' has been prefixed by interlineation in the hand in which the two doubtful lines are written. This is an indication, to all who are familiar with records or legal documents, that, whatever else may have been written where there is now an erasure, the name of Oldcastle was wanting. In these instruments, whenever a person has been once mentioned, he is described at every subsequent mention as 'the said.' So far then it is beyond all question established that the indictment of Oldcastle as enrolled in the King's Bench is not, word for word, the document which might at one time have been read in the same place.

The indictment bears date the first year of the reign of Henry V. The subsequent proceedings in Parliament were not instituted immediately, but four years afterwards. In the meantime Oldcastle, who ^{His outlawry.} failed to appear to the indictment (if there ever was one against him), was outlawed.

According to law, a person who had been indicted for treason, who did not appear, and who had been outlawed, might, if afterwards captured, be sentenced to ^{The sentence upon him.} death as a traitor, and executed without further trial. It was Oldcastle's misfortune to be taken three or four years after his outlawry. The Commons desired that the proceedings relating to Oldcastle in the King's Bench should be produced in the House. Certain documents were brought in and read in the presence of Oldcastle himself, against whom judgment was given 'by authority of Parliament, and by virtue of the aforesaid outlawry.' The sentence was that he should be drawn through London to the new gallows in Giles's, and there hanged, and burned hanging.

In the Rolls of Parliament a reference is made, not vaguely, to the records of the King's Bench, but to the term and to the very membrane on which the indictment is to be found ; and the reference agrees with the place in which the indictment already described appears. Two copies of the instrument accompany the record of the proceedings in Parliament, but neither of them agrees precisely with the original document in the King's Bench. Neither of them contains the names of the two persons accused with Oldcastle ; and all matter relating to them alone is excluded. In a substantive part of the indictment, too, where the names of Blake and Acton occur in the King's Bench record, without any mention of Oldcastle, the name of Oldcastle alone has been substituted in the Parliamentary transcripts. Thus a document which, as it stands on the King's Bench Roll, affords evidence that the name of Oldcastle was at one time not included among those of the persons indicted becomes in the Parliamentary transcript a record of the indictment of Oldcastle alone.

In spite, however, of the grave suspicion suggested by these facts, and in spite of the frequency with which the ' rasing of records ' is mentioned during these troubled times, it would be unjust to assert that any person in Parliament was a party to a forgery. There of the proceedings on the Rolls of Parliament :

Enrolment
the discrepancies.

Forgery or carelessness?

is a memorandum appended to the King's Bench Roll, by which it appears that the Chief Justice himself, produced in full Parliament so much of the document as referred to Oldcastle. From this it may be inferred that the imperfect transcript in the Rolls of Parliament had at least the official authority of the Court of King's Bench. Nor is there reason to suppose that any alteration except that which gave the whole indictment the appearance of referring to Oldcastle alone—was made after Parliament had asked for the proceedings in the King's Bench. There is ample evidence on another membrane of the roll that Oldcastle, with a number of persons accused of being implicated in the conspiracy, was outlawed in the second year of the reign of Henry V.—three years before sentence was passed in Parliament. If therefore forgery is to be imputed, the forger must have been some official connected with the King's Bench, and he must have introduced Oldcastle's name almost immediately after the indictment against Blake and Acton was presented to the court. In almost all rolls, too, it happens sometimes that the marks of erasure are visible in places in which it is impossible that the eraser can have had any dishonest intention, and there remains, therefore, the bare possibility that in this case a careless clerk may have made a mistake, and that a knife may have been used to save labour and parchment. The judge had power to direct such alteration, if necessary. But, on the other hand, the erasure is of unusual extent, and the rest of the document does not support the theory of a corrected mistake. There has been given in the fourth chapter of this history sufficient evidence to show that it would have been no very difficult task to corrupt an officer of the court ; and when a record of the highest importance bears such marks as the indictment of Oldcastle, even though we might in charity pronounce that forgery is 'not proven,' we should still have to pronounce that there has been carelessness and concealment of carelessness hardly less culpable than forgery itself.

At this early period all proceedings in cases of treason were tainted with prejudice, and, according to our modern notions, were violent and unjust. If Oldcastle suffered through a forged indictment, others before and after have suffered in a manner which hardly less deserves reprobation. Nothing could be more unjust than to import the odium theologicum into Oldcastle's case, and to represent that he was, so far as the accusation of treason was concerned, an instance of a man condemned by the clerical party contrary to the usages of the time. Parliament, it is true, added the punishment of burning to the punishment of hanging, because Oldcastle had been pronounced guilty of heresy as well as of treason. But when the party in power was convinced that Oldcastle was dangerous to it, his death, in one way or other, was certain, and would have been certain had there been not a single Bishop in the realm. What we have most to regard in this case is not so much the individual as the times. In the preceding chapter it has been shown what moral tone was pervading all classes; Oldcastle's death was only one out of many illustrations which might be selected. It is our good fortune to live in an age when all classes, clergy and laity alike, have participated in a great improvement. To mark out a particular class as the one scape-goat of the past, would be to show ignorance alike of the causes which made that past what it was, and of the causes which have made this present what it is.

It appears by the King's Bench document to which

Oldcastle's
death not to be attributed to the clergy alone.

reference has been made that Walter Blake and Sir Roger Acton were found guilty of treason by jury, according to the ordinary course, and were sentenced to be drawn through London and hanged, where Oldcastle afterwards suffered, at the new gallows in St. Giles's. This spot was selected for the scene of the executions because, according to the accusation, it was in St. Giles's Fields that the conspirators were to have met, and that their forces were to have assembled. Their scheme, according to the indictment, (which seems to be genuine so far as Blake and Acton are concerned,) was to put the king and his brothers to death, and to abolish the royal dignity, to set Oldcastle at the head of affairs with the title of Regent, (which would have been equivalent to President or Protector) to proclaim that there were to be no bishops, and no orders of monks in the land, to force all who had been members of those orders into secular occupations, to destroy all relics in churches or religious houses, and to establish a form of government in accordance with their own opinions. Those who consider how completely this was an anticipation of what was actually accomplished in the time of Cromwell, and how well it accords with the similar, but less precise demands of Wat. Tyler and his fellows, will have little difficulty in believing that there may really have been a conspiracy, even though Oldcastle may not have given his consent.

The double punishment of hanging and burning, inflicted on Oldcastle, is the best illustration in action of the alliance which the clergy had now succeeded in effecting with the upper classes of the laity. Both parties believed that they had a common interest in crushing a common enemy. The one resorted to its usual weapon—a charge of treason—the other to a weapon which it had not hitherto had many occasions of using in England—a charge of heresy. The effect, however, of this alliance was, for a time at least, to place two weapons instead of one in the hands of either party. A charge of treason could be rendered more formidable by the addition of a charge of heresy—a charge of heresy by the addition of a charge of treason. Heresy was by no means strictly defined in any law, and the diocesan appears to have had the power of deciding whether any particular doctrine was heresy or not. There was also an offence falling within ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which, if not strictly heresy, was of so heretical a character that according to some lawyers a writ ‘for burning a heretic’ might issue, at common law, against persons who had been found guilty of it. This was the offence in which the belief, descending from time immemorial, was noticed in the first chapter of the present history, and which is specially prominent from the beginning of the fifteenth to the end of the seventeenth centuries—the offence of witchcraft.

Aims of Oldcastle, Blake, and Acton.

Alliance of the clergy with the upper classes of the laity.

Every one is familiar with stories, which were current in generations not long since passed away, of men and of women who had read more than their neighbours, who acquired the reputation of students, and who, if they incurred the least unpopularity were set down as witches or wizards. In the earlier part of the fifteenth century, when letters were but just reviving, a lay-man or a lay-woman who showed any strong appetite for learning was infinitely more likely to be an object of suspicion than at the end of the eighteenth. The orthodox clergy, of course, maintained that the most suspicious form of study which lay people could

Charges of Witchcraft : study pronounced disgraceful to lay people.

undertake was that of divinity. The consequence was that the clerical party enlisted as far as they could every knightly prejudice on their side, and represented a thirst for knowledge as essentially unchivalrous. It was easy, too, to foster a belief that no one could know, or even wish to know, more than his neighbours, except through the influence of the Devil. Oldcastle was one of the very few laymen of the day who had a spirit above this popular prejudice ; and a contemporary song against the Lollards contains an allusion to him which well expresses the dominant sentiment of the age :—

I trow there be no knight alive
That would have done so open shame
For that craft to study or strive ;
It is no gentlemanne's game.

When the jealousy and dread of superior knowledge were prevalent, it was impossible that the hunt for Lollards should not suggest a hunt for sorcerers. The pestilences, too, which had over-Connexion between charges of heresy and charges of witchcraft.
 run Europe must have stimulated the sale of charms, and given a new power to quacks of every kind, and to superstition in every form. The reign of Henry IV., remarkable for the burning of Sautre, and writs to arrest heretics, is remarkable also for an attempt to suppress witchcraft. The king had been informed that many sorcerers, magicians, enchanters, necromancers, diviners, and soothsayers, were practising every day their horrible and detestable arts, and causing others to be perverted and brought into ill repute. It was feared that even greater evils might follow unless some remedy were shortly provided. A bishop was therefore required to search for sorcerers within his diocese, and to commit them to prison after conviction, or, should it seem expedient, before, to be kept there until repentance or further orders.

The most terrible and the most disgraceful of all executions for witchcraft, though Englishmen had too great a share in it, was not brought to pass on English soil.

The Maid of Orleans. The story of the Maid of Orleans is so well known and so painful that it is unnecessary to do more than recapitulate its leading incidents. She was a simple country girl, the monotony of whose life was relieved only by rare converse with a traveller halting at the remote inn where she served. The great subject of the day was the misery of France overrun by the English. She could talk of little else when any rough wayfarer condescended to give her a word; she could think of nothing else when left to brood by herself. With a nature full of affection and energy, she had neither child nor husband to love, nor any object in life for which she could work. The whole strength of her character was forced into two channels—imagination and devotion. To wish France free and Charles on the throne was to see it all with her mind's eye; to kneel down in prayer was to pray for the realisation of the picture. Before long this mental exaltation found a relief in action. The possible future, ever present to her mind, needed only a passionate faith in religion to appear an inspiration. The dreaming waitress and stable-girl became a prophetess and a heroine. Her belief gave her strength to wear a man's armour and do more than a man's deeds of arms. She showed to all posterity a proof that a firm purpose, supported by an undoubting trust in the future, is of almost unlimited power. Strong warriors fell before her as though they had been babes; the appearance of her banner was the signal for a rout; and ere many weeks had passed she saw her dreams converted into facts by the coronation of Charles, as king of France, at Rheims. It was her misfortune afterwards to be captured by a Burgundian force. She was sold to the English—for prisoners of war were not uncommonly regarded as articles of commerce in the days of chivalry—and, while in their hands, she was tried for heresy and witchcraft. An ecclesiastical tribunal, composed chiefly of Frenchmen, was brought together, and pronounced that her victorious standard had gained some magical force through her incantations, and that her inspiration was from the Devil. She was thrown into prison, and afterwards, on pretence that she had recanted and again fallen into her evil ways, she was burnt alive in the market-place of Rouen.

A few months after the execution of Joan of Arc, in France, when the young Henry VI. was in the tenth year of his reign, his Council was devoting considerable attention to witchcraft in England. Search for sorcerers in England. A writ issued for the arrest of Thomas Northfeld, a member of the order of Preachers in Worcester, and a Professor of Divinity, who was to be brought before the King's Council, together with all suspected matter belonging to him, and especially his books which treated of sorcery. In the same year, one Margery Jourdemayn, together with a clerk and a friar, were brought before the Council, which decreed that the two latter might be released from prison on finding sufficient bail for their future good behaviour, and Margery also, provided her husband would be her surety. There is also every reason to believe that, although the extreme penalty may have been rarely exacted, there was for many years a species of crusade against persons suspected of practising the forbidden arts, who no doubt had but an ill time among their neighbours, even if they were not brought into a secular or ecclesiastical court. Ten years after the accusation against Margery Jourdemayn, it appears that the king gave a warrant to the Treasurer for the distribution of rewards among those doctors, notaries, and clerks who were exerting themselves for the destruction of 'the superstitious sect of necromancers, enchanters, and sorcerers.'

At this time, too, just before the Wars of the Roses, the charge of witchcraft became, like the charge of heresy, a political engine. One of the most distinguished sufferers was the Duchess of Gloucester, whose husband had been appointed one of the guardians of the realm upon the accession of the child-king, Henry VI. After the death of the joint guardian, the Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Gloucester occupied the highest position in the kingdom next to that of the imbecile youth who occupied the throne. The chief competitor for power, in opposition to the Duke, was Cardinal Beaufort, bishop of Winchester, to whom the person and education of the young king had been entrusted at the beginning of the reign. The clerical party, of which the Cardinal was the head, resolved to strike a blow at their enemy through his wife. The Duchess was seized at Leeds and thrown into prison; and she was afterwards brought up to London to take her trial for witchcraft.

The prelates who were to conduct the examination sat in St. Stephen's Chapel at Westminster. They were Cardinal Beaufort, Cardinal Kempe, five bishops, and other clerical dignitaries; and the king himself was present. The Duchess was led into the chapel, and formally accused of having consorted with that Margery Jourdemayn whose name has already been mentioned (and who was known as the Witch of Eye), as well as with other sorcerers. By their aid, it was said, a waxen image of the king had been made, which the Duchess had set before a fire, so that it might gradually melt away. Incantations had been used for the purpose of connecting the melting image with the living king—so that as the one slowly lost its form and likeness to humanity, the other might sink slowly into the grave. The sense of humour must have been strangely wanting in the august assembly which sat to investigate this charge. Not one of the whole number seems to have been struck with the incongruity of a king and the most powerful of his spiritual advisers sitting solemnly in a consecrated building, of which the name was famous, to ascertain whether a great lady and a silly woman had or had not—melted a piece of wax.

The charge of witchcraft as a political engine : the Duchess of Gloucester.

Her Trial.

It need hardly be said that the Duchess was found guilty. Her husband's political opponents would have had her executed after the manner of heretics, but the young king, now arrived at manhood, had sufficient good feeling to save her life. She was induced to confess, and condemned to a penance which could hardly have inflicted less torture on her than burning itself, and was no doubt devised chiefly for the humiliation of her husband. It seems to have made a profound impression upon the populace; and in one of the songs of the period she is made to bewail her fall, and to tell the whole story of her punishment:—

Thorough London in many a street
Of them that were most principal,
I went barefoot upon my feet
That some time wont to ride royal.
Father of Heaven, and Lord of all,
As thou wilt so must it be;
The syn of pride will have a fall;
All women may be ware by me.

After walking through the streets to be jeered by such a mob as was the mob of London in the fifteenth century, she was carried off to the Isle of Man, there to pass the rest of her days in prison. The Witch of Eye was burnt in Smithfield, and a male sorcerer was hanged at Tyburn.

Charges of witchcraft, once having taken their place among the engines of political warfare, did not, during the Wars of the Roses, stop short of the royal household, or even of kings. Edward of York having, by the aid of that Earl of Warwick who was afterwards known as the king-maker, driven Henry VI. from the throne and seated himself upon it, by the title of Edward IV., was betrayed into an act of great imprudence. At the very time when his chief supporter was negotiating for him a marriage with a princess of Savoy, a sister of the Queen of France, he hastily married a lady who, though of gentle blood, was in no sense a fitting mate for the King of England. She was the daughter of a small landowner or knight, named Woodville, and she had married another small landowner or knight, named Gray, who had fought on the side of the Lancastrians against Edward, had been killed in battle, and had left her a widow with a family of young children. Her mother, however, had more pretensions to princely rank, but had descended from it in marrying Woodville. Jacquette of Luxembourg had married that Duke of Bedford who had been joint Guardian of the Realm with Gloucester upon the accession of Henry VI. After the death of her first husband, she appears to have preferred love to position, and thus became the mother of one queen, the grandmother of another, and the great grandmother of Henry VIII., the second king of the Tudor line.

The Duchess of Bedford and her daughter Queen Elizabeth suspected of witchcraft.

In modern times the marriage of Edward IV.—a notorious libertine—to Elizabeth Gray would have been attributed to infatuation; in the fifteenth century men went farther, and attributed infatuation to witchcraft. The king, who had many enemies before, made enemies of his best friends in taking John Gray's widow to wife. Rumours were soon spread by them that, whatever the queen might be, her mother at least must be a witch. As the silly story passed from mouth to mouth, it caused the Duchess of Bedford an alarm which—with the fate of the Duchess of Gloucester in her recollection—was by no means groundless. She took a course which, however ludicrous it may appear in our time, was perhaps, in those days that which wisdom would pronounce the safest. She ascertained the names of some of the persons who had been maligning her, and prayed that they might be called to answer before the Great Council. She complained that three images of lead, of the length of a man's finger, had been shown from hand to hand as the instruments of her sorcery. One of them, it was said, was in the likeness of the king, another of the queen; and it was no doubt insinuated that the influence which the queen retained over him, after his passion might have been expected to die out, was due to magical arts. The first act of the men required to exculpate themselves before the Council was to deny that they had ever said a word to incriminate the Duchess. An image, it was admitted, had been handed about, but the Duchess's name had not been mentioned in connection with it; and one man went so far as to add that he had 'never heard no witchcraft of my Lady of Bedford.' Upon this, the Council pronounced that she was cleared of suspicion. On her petition it was commanded that the proceedings should be 'enacted of record,' so that the decision might be of use at any future time. Yet had she known past history or her own age, she might have foreseen that all her precautions would be of no avail, should she ever be without a powerful protector. When Edward IV. was dead, and the Lords and Commons offered the throne to the 'Most High and Mighty Prince, Richard, Duke of Gloucester,' they gave not a thought to what had gone before. They declared that the pretended marriage between King Edward and Elizabeth Gray was 'made by means of sorcery and witchcraft, committed by Elizabeth and her mother, Jacquette, Duchess of Bedford, as the common opinion of the people and the public voice and fame is through all this land.'

Towards the end of the reign of Edward IV. and immediately after his death, accusations and counter-accusations of witchcraft, or of similar malpractices, were the common weapons both of the court and of its adversaries. It has commonly been represented that Thomas Burdett suffered as a traitor because, when he heard that a favourite white buck of his was killed, while the king was hunting in his park, he had petulantly expressed a wish that the buck had been in the king's belly—horns and all. In the indictment which remains of record there is no mention of the buck or of its horns, nor of anything which can refer to this story, except, perhaps, the charge that Burdett disseminated seditious rhymes and ballads, composed with the intention of drawing away from the king the love of his subjects. A deer-hunt was, probably enough, the theme of many a song which may have given offence at court. But the charge actually made against Burdett in the King's Bench was, that he trea-

Charge of witchcraft against Thomas
Burdett.

sonably imagined and compassed the death of the king, with the assistance of one John Stacey and one Thomas Blake. These two men, it was alleged, in order to carry the traitorous intention into effect, worked and calculated by art magic, necromancy, and astronomy, the final destruction of the King and Prince of Wales. They treasonably revealed to other persons the result of their calculations and devices, which was that both the king and the Prince must shortly die. It is further stated in the indictment that, according to the determination of Holy Church, and the opinions of divers doctors, it is forbidden to any liege-man thus to meddle concerning kings and princes, by calculating their nativities without their permission. The three were found guilty. Blake obtained a pardon through the intercession of the Bishop of Norwich; but the other two underwent the hideous sentence passed in those days upon traitors.

Closely connected with the charges against Burdett were the charges soon afterwards made against George, Duke of Clarence. In the attainder passed against him, it is alleged that he had accused the king of injustice in bringing a false accusation against Burdett, and in securing a conviction by bribing servants and others to divulge pretended conversations of a treasonable nature. But the most remarkable part of the bill is that in which he is accused of having imputed necromancy to the king. Not only, according to this document, had Clarence said that Edward removed by poison those whom he could not destroy by law, but that he reached by witchcraft those whom he could not reach by poison, and caused the Duke himself to waste away as a candle is consumed in burning. There is a well-known story in the chroniclers that Clarence was permitted by the king to select his own mode of death, and that he was drowned in a butt of malnsey.

The duke of Clarence charged with having imputed witchcraft to Edward IV. himself.

Whatever may have been the end of Clarence, there seems to be no doubt that, unlike that of most so-called traitors, it was not by public execution—a remarkable exception in an age when the publicity of an execution was secured by distributing pieces of the traitor's body throughout the kingdom, and when every punishment consisted, in part at least, of exposure to the insults of a brutal crowd. It was no doubt through some remains of interest at court, or through the king's sense of the dignity of the blood-royal, that the Duke obtained the favour. After the death of Edward, not even his mistress could save herself from the ignominy of being jeered by the mob. Jane Shore was the last of the principal actors in the series of trials connected with witchcraft, which are a conspicuous feature of the disputes between the Houses of York and Lancaster, and of the quarrels between the members of either House. This unfortunate woman, who seems to have committed no crime, except obedience to the will of a licentious and tyrannical king, was summoned, at the instance of Richard III., to answer the accusation of sorcery. For some reasons, which it is unnecessary to investigate, the proceedings were not carried out to the usual conclusion, and Jane was tried in an ecclesiastical court for adultery and lewd behaviour, which it was easy enough to prove against her. She was pronounced guilty, and condemned to do public penance—walking through the streets barefoot, and carrying a lighted taper. We can, perhaps, imagine what would be the sufferings of any city dame condemned to be the

Accusation
of witchcraft against Jane Shore.

laughing-stock of a London crowd in our time. But this would be nothing to the treatment which would, in the fifteenth century, have befallen a royal paramour set up as a show at St. Paul's, even when she attracted, as it seems Jane Shore did, the sympathy of some spectators.

Of all the strange coincidences and apparent contradictions which present themselves in history, none seem, at the first glance, so strange as the coincidence that the belief in Witchcraft comes into the most marked prominence at the very time which is remarkable also for the introduction of Printing. While contemplating the effects of a delusion which evinces the darkest ignorance, we are suddenly dazzled by the appearance of an art which we are in the habit of associating with the greatest enlightenment. How can such a contrast have been brought to pass? Is learning powerless to eradicate superstition? Are human affairs a medley in which everything is to be attributed to chance and nothing to law, and of which the component elements change their nature and re-distribute themselves by caprice?

A strange coincidence: introduction of printing at a time when accusations of witchcraft became most prominent.

To such questions as these there is a sufficient answer in the surrounding circumstances of the period under consideration, and in the very means by which the art of printing was invented and set in use. The forces which had been at work for centuries had for centuries been opposed to one another. On the one hand the spirit of private war had been arming baron against baron—one body of retainers against another; on the other hand the spirit of commerce and the spirit of invention had been slowly acquiring strength in the towns, though checked by the barbarism which continued to exist both within and without the walls. Edward IV., made king by the aid of a baron king-maker, accused and accusing others of witchcraft, and yet becoming the patron of Caxton, was but the head of a nation which as yet hardly deserved the name, and in which widely different interests produced contrasts even greater than those which are produced by a more complex civilisation.

Attempt to explain the contrast: the towns and the country.

In order, however, to estimate correctly the progress indicated by the invention of the art of printing, which, from its after effects, is apt to excite unbounded admiration, an attempt must be made to understand the condition of certain other arts at the time when the inventor or inventors lived. We shall then perceive that the amount of ingenuity required is by no means in proportion to the value of the results by which the introduction of the new art was followed. In almost all essential points, printing is identical with an invention of which the origin is lost in remote antiquity. No nation which was in any way brought into contact with the ancient Roman civilisation could long be ignorant of the construction and use of the seal. A seal is neither more nor less than stereotype used for the purpose of printing on wax. Such an instrument was in the possession of every land-holder and of every corporation in England, centuries before the adaptation of an old device to a new material and for a new purpose. Nor is the connecting link between the ancient seal and the type, consisting of moveable letters, like some of the connecting links for which naturalists have sought in vain, a mere matter of inference. The earliest attempt to print was made by means of a block, or, in other words, of a page of type in which the individual letters could not be moved. This was simply a large seal, from which an

Degree of progress indicated by the invention of printing.

impression was taken by means of ink, instead of by indentation upon a soft material like wax. The blocks, though clumsy, might long have sufficed for such printing as was required, when there was little desire to read any books, except now and then a romance, or a controversial treatise on divinity, and when the expense of parchment was an effectual check upon the multiplication of copies, had not paper of a fine texture ceased to be a too expensive substitute for skins.

At the end of the fourteenth century there was, in Europe, sufficient commercial enterprise and sufficient mechanical skill to produce a linen-paper, of which even a modern printer might avail himself. There seems to be no doubt that in the earlier part of the same century paper was sometimes made from cotton, that there was then made the first rude attempt to manufacture it from linen rags, and that a few years sufficed to render the new art of practical value. As commerce increased, and deeds grew more numerous, and records multiplied, the demand for parchment became far stronger than it had been in earlier times; and, as the supply was limited, the price necessarily rose. The inconvenience must have been very great, and have given a strong impulse to the inventive powers of the townsmen who had been the chief causes of it. The activity of the towns and many features of their internal condition are most opportunely brought into prominence by writs sent out, in conformity with an order of Parliament, in the year 1388, and by the returns in which the various guilds set forth their ordinances. The dearth of skins prepared for writing (which the ancient palimpsests show to have been not altogether a recent annoyance) and the slowly growing competition of paper, find more than one in the manufacture of paper.

Improvement

curious illustration in these documents. The ordinances of the Guild of Saddlers and Spurriers at Norwich are written on a piece of vellum which has once served as two leaves of a book. Lines had been ruled on each side of each page, and the holes made for the thread, in binding, tell, like the lines, the past history of the skin. When the clerk of the guild had to prepare the return, he flattened out the fold which made the division between the two leaves, disregarded the damage done by the binder, and wrote across the ruled lines, just as though they had had no existence, and he had been dealing with a new skin. When such parsimony as this is apparent on the face of a parliamentary return, it is not surprising to discover that the regulations of another guild had been, a few years earlier, written on paper. But, perhaps, the most striking evidence of the attention now excited by the want of materials for writing exists in the original writs sent to the guilds after the order had been made in Parliament. Many of them, though seeming at first sight to be written on parchment, are pronounced by experts to be written on linen-paper, with the wire marks plainly visible upon close inspection. It is by no means impossible that some fraudulent dealer in parchment may have deceived the clerks of the Chancery with spurious wares; but, whatever the true explanation may be, the use of paper with the apparent sanction of legal officials is a matter of some importance.

Step by step with the advance of commerce and of business in the law courts, the art of writing made progress among the higher classes. If we did not know what was the state of society in the middle of the fourteenth century, we might have some difficulty in understanding how it came to pass that no king of the French line, before Richard II., is known to have written so much as his own name. It is possible, indeed, that some of his predecessors were not absolutely unable to form a letter, and that ancient custom alone forbade the sovereign to make a signature in the modern sense of the term. Still there could hardly be a better sign of the times than the abandonment of this ancient prejudice and the substitution of a name for a cross. The influence of the royal example was widely felt, and families of position began to perceive that correspondence between their members would not be degrading, even though each correspondent might have to use the pen with his own hand. Letters written soon after this time are still extant, and suggest yet another cause for the increasing clearness of parchment and the increasing demand for paper.

Paper a substitute for parchment: increase of correspondence.

Not the least curious among the curious movements which followed the Black Death, within a century and a half, is the interchange of uses between writing and sealing, stamping, or printing. On the one hand penmanship was beginning to show that it would, sooner or later, take the place of the seal in various transactions between man and man; on the other hand the seal was, so to speak, taken to pieces, and each piece, consisting of a single letter, was used in endless combinations to make an impression with ink upon paper, and so to multiply the books which could previously be multiplied only by the scribe. The impression of the seal upon wax, long afterwards a necessary appendage to all documents which were to be produced in a court of law, was at first equivalent to a modern signing of the name; it was supposed to be a proof that the owner of the seal had set his hand to a deed or writing in token of approval.

Interchange of uses between the pen and the seal.

So far was this doctrine carried that the ancient felony which corresponds to our forgery could not be committed with the pen, nor, in any way, without a counterfeit seal. There are numerous records which show that even to fabricate writs was no felony unless the seal was counterfeited. To heat a knife in the fire, cut through a seal (made of beeswax), substitute a false writ for the true one, and attach the real seal to the false writ was a very common practice; but the offence was held to be no more than a trespass. In the reign of Henry IV. a man was accused of having counterfeited the Great Seal. This was High Treason. The jury, however, found that the Seal had not been counterfeited, but that the impression, which had belonged to a genuine document, had been removed and made to serve for a document which was spurious. The magnitude of the crime rendered the judges anxious to award the criminal a fitting punishment, and, after some delay, they declared that Treason had been committed, and passed the usual sentence. But the lawyers of a later time have not been satisfied with this judgment, for which there is no warrant in the Statute of Treasons; and there can be little doubt that, according to the strict letter of the law, the offence which had been committed was not capital. There was thus a great want of precision in the definition of a crime which was one of the most prevalent in that age. The subsequent improvement in manners, and the spread of education to which printing has greatly contributed, have had the effect not, as might have been feared, of increasing the number of forgers with the number of persons able to write, but of checking forgery by rendering detection easy, and sharpening the wits of lawgivers and judges.

Writing, printing, sealing, and forgery.

The introduction of paper no doubt helped to extend the art of writing, just as the art of writing helped to extend the demand for paper ; and thus, when some skill had been attained in paper-making, there existed the only two incentives required for the development of the art of printing—a nascent love of letters, and a material on which books could be printed more cheaply than on parchment. The coincidences of time are very striking. Good paper was first made during the reign of the first English king who signed his own name, and from that time only half a century was required for the ancient seal, which had been unchanged for ages, to be developed into the printing-block, and the printing-block into moveable types. The honour of this adaptation, like that of most adaptations, is claimed by rival nations. It does not, however, like that of most mechanical inventions, belong to England ; but the new art was introduced into England by Caxton during the reign of Edward IV.

A plain statement of preceding events greatly diminishes the wonder at first excited by the appearance of Caxton during the Wars of the Roses, and when the belief in Witchcraft was at its height. The invention of printing was not very marvellous at the time, and its possible effects were not manifest for many a generation afterwards.

The improvement of paper, and the invention of printing due to the spirit of commerce.

Real changes in the manners of mankind are rarely effected at one stroke, either by a new law or by a new invention ; and had not the same causes which brought the first printed book into existence gained new strength with every generation, it is possible that even the art of printing might have languished for want of support, and that the printing-press might long have remained a mere curiosity, like the balloon or the electrical engine. It was the commercial spirit which had rendered printing possible. It was the commercial spirit which introduced printing into England; for Caxton was early in life a member of the Mercers' Company in London, and was afterwards, from his knowledge of mercantile affairs, commissioned by Edward IV. to negotiate a treaty with the Duke of Burgundy. The commercial spirit, also, by fostering all the other arts, fostered the tastes and the culture upon which the art of printing depended, or, in other words, which created the demand for printed books. Bishops and barons had for centuries been opposed to any innovation—the one class content with its own superior but limited knowledge, the other with its own rude courage and dense ignorance; and so the barons and the bishops might have gone on for centuries more, had they not had new stores of learning forced upon them by the burghers.

The first use of the printing-press in England may be taken to mark the time at which the commercial spirit had so far gained upon its old enemy that it could contend on equal terms with the military spirit of the worst kind—the spirit of private war. The contempt—even now by no means extinct—which the land-holders had always felt for the towns-men, was somewhat mitigated—as contempt always is—by the success of the persons despised. King Edward IV. not only patronised Caxton and gave his countenance to traders, but, as was whispered, condescended to increase his revenue by commercial ventures of his own. The burgher might hope that he would one day be able to hold up his head and claim equality with the descendants of the men who had perhaps owned his forefathers as slaves. One of the most powerful families in England, indeed, had already been founded by that Michael de la Pole who had been created Earl of Suffolk, had held the office of Chancellor under Richard II., and had been but the son of a rich merchant—lender of money to Edward III.

The commercial spirit and the spirit of private war.

Prejudice in the country against the towns, and prejudice in the towns against the country (beginning, perhaps, in the remote past, when some barbarian horde had starved a city into submission, and had treated with contumely the citizens whom they had robbed), had been perpetuated by diversity of interests and habits. The burgher, with some justice, regarded the knight as a brigand; the knight, not altogether without reason, regarded the burgher as a cheat. Had the knight possessed a monopoly of honesty, he might with a better grace have denounced the burgher as a contemptible seeker after the filthiest of lucre. Had he had no beam in his own eye, his opinion upon the mote in the eye of the burgher might have been a little more worthy of attention. But those among the burghers who had some of the instincts of thieves were loth to acknowledge the truth of reproaches from gentlemen who had some of the instincts of robbers.

It must be confessed, however, that the dishonesty which showed itself every day during the growth of English commerce might justly have been termed shameful by any one but a brigand. The knight or the lord sent to the markets at Bristol or Gloucester for cloth to make the uniforms of his little army of retainers. The outside appeared to be all that was needed, but as soon as the piece was unrolled the greater part of it was found to be made of inferior wool, to be deficient in breadth, or even to be of different

Country
robbers, and town thieves.

The knight's complaints against the townsman.

colours. He bought rings and beads for his mistress, a pommel for his sword, cups with covers to set on his table, and candlesticks to adorn his hall, believing them to be made of gold or of silver ; but that which he thought was gold was gilded copper, and that which he thought was silver was silvered latten or brass. He laid down in his cellar what a merchant had said was a tun of wine, but he was defrauded in the measure, of many a gallon. He stocked his larder with salted herrings, salted salmon, and salted eels to last through the winter ; and when the barrels were opened they were seen to contain a few good fish at the top and a number of broken and inferior fish below. He went abroad as ambassador to a foreign court and had to hear complaint after complaint that his fellow-countrymen had exported wool of less weight and of worse quality than the purchaser had contracted to receive, and that no man knew what he was buying when he bought the worsted of Norfolk. When the envoy returned, it was only to hear that smugglers were every day evading the export duties on wools and woollens, and the import duties upon such luxuries as cloth of silver or gold, velvet, silk, and damask. The very money due to him he could not safely accept until he had complied with a statute which declared the ill-repute of the current coin by the provision that all payments in gold must be made by weight. It is not surprising that he should then have retired to his country-seat and waited among his flocks, and his herds, and his game, until he could find employment for his lance and his charger.

Thus the sins of individuals were attributed to a class, and townsman remained an epithet of contempt or ridicule long after townsmen had become free and rich. The burgher turned gentleman was destined to be one of the fittest subjects for a comedy as soon as comedy revived, and is even now a subject from which it is easy to raise a laugh! Yet in the days when Rome was mistress of the world, town life was believed to make the gentleman, and the rustic was commonly represented as a boor, so stupid that he would watch on the banks of the river in the hope of seeing all the water flow away and of walking across the bed left dry. Never was joke more grimly thrown back against the joker than when robber hordes dismembered the Roman Empire, possessed themselves of the towns, and declared themselves to be the most noble and honourable persons on the earth. In the present day gentlemen do not, as they did in the fifteenth century, think it beneath their dignity to dwell in a city; but even in the present day it is not difficult to trace many social distinctions to the ancient feud between citizen and knight. We have, however, the good fortune to live in an age when men of leisure are no longer brigands, and when, instead of seizing the wares and the coin of traders, they appropriate only the greatest share of that polish which town-life gives, and of which but little falls to the lot of the busy trader who created it.

To one who asks how the successor of the brutal marauder became an accomplished gentleman, there is but one answer. Save in one point—that dignity of bearing which has been remarked even among savages who have been accustomed to command—it is the townsman who has made the gentleman what he is. If the gentleman has a taste for architecture, the architecture is itself the product of town-life. The towns directly or indirectly found the wealth to bring the materials together; the architect himself was commonly a townsman—the offspring of a villein who had run away from his lord. If the gentleman has a taste for painting, his taste comes from the same source as his taste for architecture. The very demand, created by the Church, for architects and painters, during the Middle Ages, was but a reminiscence of the old Roman culture, which had to some extent affected the professors of the Christian religion, and which had grown out of the love of the Romans for the life of the town. In the monasteries, where some monks were taught Latin and writing, the knowledge which was cultivated was but a slender relic of the knowledge once cultivated in the Imperial City. Scarcely an art can be mentioned which has not had its origin in town-life, which has not come to us immediately from towns comparatively modern, or through the Church from the towns of antiquity. All that trains the eye to appreciate new combinations of form and colour, all that gives the intellect strength, all that gives urbanity to manners, can be traced through one channel or another to the association of men in towns. The very wealth which constitutes one of the distinctions between the civilised and the barbarous is the growth of the towns, and not least the growth of the towns when it takes the form of an increase in the value of land. A plentiful harvest is garnered not less by the wits of the townsman than by the hands of the ploughman, the sower, and the reaper; and the farmer has to confess, year by year, new obligations to the mechanic.

The social pretensions of town and country.

All mental culture traced to the towns.

While, therefore, it is not difficult to sympathise with the knight who, looking at the townsman in only one aspect, proclaimed him to be a cheat, it is impossible not to sympathise with the townsman who broke through the barriers of caste, and civilised the knight in spite of himself. We have seen how fraud and force went hand in hand in the early days of commerce, how commerce had to struggle against the lawless spirit of the brigand, how dishonesty within the walls was but the counterpart of robbery without. Yet the very existence of laws and bye-laws for the suppression of roguery and violence shows that there were at a very early period some knights who were not at heart highwaymen and some traders who were not at heart thieves. In every age there are some men who are a little better than their fellows ; and their excellence, when circumstances are favourable, is but the mediocrity of a later time, the beginning of a series of steps towards improvement. As Oldcastle was a gentleman who did not despise learning, so we may believe there were merchants who did not despise honesty. There is nothing, indeed, of which we may be more certain ; for, had deception been the one essential feature of trade, it would have been impossible to create that confidence between man and man upon which trade depends for its existence. But though we of the nineteenth century are better able to judge what has been done for the world by towns, and manufactures, and inventions, we may, perhaps, spare a little compassion for some rude old knight, of the fifteenth, whose lot it was to hear, time after time, that the useful son of his hereditary slave had had the spirit to wander away in search of freedom, and afterwards that the runaway was growing rich in a chartered town. He believed, no doubt, that the world was coming to an end, that virtue in every shape was dying out, and that when a landowner could not retain possession of his own ' natives ' there was an end to all the laws of property. Who cannot imagine the spleen with which he would denounce the changes going on around him, and the strong epithets he would apply to the fugitives and to the men who sheltered them? He has, indeed, made the English language bear testimony to his indignation, for when he most wished to describe the townsman as capable of everything base and of everything underhand—as a liar after the fashion of all slaves, as a thief by the very act which stole a human body from its lawful master, and converted it into a citizen—he could think of no more comprehensive term than—villain.

If it be asked how the towns could have gained power, and how commerce could have grown during such a lawless period as that in which the Wars of the Roses were fought out, an obvious answer presents itself. The Wars of the Roses, though brought into greater prominence by historians, could hardly have been more injurious to the country than those civil wars on a smaller scale, which knight had for centuries been waging against knight, and baron against baron. It matters little whether peace is disturbed in order to raise one king and overthrow another, or in order to settle the claim to a manor or an honour. The service and the sentiments of the retainer were the same in each case. He fought for the lands of his lord or of his lord's enemy, because his lord commanded him; and, because his lord commanded him, he fought for Henry of Lancaster or Edward of York. During these greater civil wars, however, the disorganisation which followed the Black Death was slowly but continuously giving aid to the towns. Many villeins, no doubt, sought their fortunes within the walls immediately after the pestilence, many after the tumults of which Wat Tyler's rebellion is the best known example, still more, perhaps, as single fugitives year by year when opportunity offered

The towns
and the fugitive villeins.

and highly coloured accounts were brought to the bondsmen of the freedom which the towns were offering as a gift.

For generations the towns had been, to all the discontented rustics, what the Cave of Adullam and the strongholds of En-gedi were to David and those men in distress who appointed him their captain. It is no wonder that when youthful deserters from the manor and its bondage came, full of energy, to the towns, the towns grew stronger in population and in enterprise ; still less is it a wonder that when the older inhabitants were continually admitting men who began life as outcasts, the outcasts did not become all at once the most honest of mankind. The marvel is that the townsmen were able to hold together as a class, that their very existence was not ended by the mutinous spirit of the new-comers, and that under such disadvantages they succeeded at last in giving us the splendid civilisation which we now enjoy.

Towards this result it may well be believed that the guilds contributed not a little in their day. As a recruit soon learns to be proud of his regiment, a runaway villein soon learned to be proud of his guild, or to have a fellow feeling with his fellow workmen. This sentiment was strengthened by his inherited animosity against the landholder ; and he was, no doubt, soon taught to be as good a citizen as his older neighbour. In very early times, if Glanville is to be trusted, a runaway from the country might hope to be admitted within that highest of all guilds, which appears to be closely connected, if not absolutely identical, with the guild merchant, and was in fact the corporation or governing body of the town. Somewhat later he might, if he failed in this, hope at least to be enrolled in some craft-guild, as a goldsmith, a spurrier, a tailor, a saddler, or a workman in one of the other trades which were growing in number and in importance. As a guilds-man of the latter kind, he would apparently have been in a position somewhat like that of a modern workman who works not for a master but for his own profit, and who might be fairly called a small tradesman. The object of the craft-guild was to protect such workers against the competition of persons who were not members, just as one object of the guild recognised in the earliest charters was to secure collectively as great a monopoly as possible for the particular town in which it was established. It was not founded, like modern trades-unions, to assert the rights of labour against capital, but to keep the market for the goods supplied by its members to those members exclusively. As, however, capital gradually increased, a new phase of society presented itself. The craft-guild became powerless and even meaningless, so far as the mere workman was concerned, and useful only to his employer. The City companies, famous for the banners which they exhibit on the 9th of November, and for their hospitality at other seasons, are the nearest modern equivalents of the ancient craft-guilds. They have, it is almost needless to remark, little in common with those combinations of craftsmen which have become prominent in the nineteenth century.

The Trade-Guilds : position of a guilds-man.

In the time of Edward IV., one branch of industry at least had advanced so far that a new comer could not

Employers and employed : their early relations. hope to participate at once in the privileges of the guild, and must have been content to work for the wages offered by an employer of labour.

Three hundred years earlier, the guilds of weavers in the various towns were composed, it may be believed, of men who worked with their own hands, sold what they had made for their own benefit, and met together on equal terms. But before the Wars of the Roses were ended capital had asserted its power in a manner which must have been more irritating to the unmoneyed workman than its mode of operation in the present day. The present mode of paying wages was that which the workman then regarded as a possible improvement in his condition. Partly, perhaps, because coin was scarce and of uncertain value, and partly because old customs are but slowly changed, the earlier capitalists paid their men half in coin and half in the produce of the men's labour. This practice was considered a great hardship ; and if the employer set on his goods a price higher than they would command in the market, the employed must necessarily have been sufferers. Whenever there is a grievance, it is supposed to be of recent origin by the persons aggrieved, who picture to themselves a happy time when such things were not permitted, and see in the past more than all they hope to gain in the future. So the working men of the fifteenth century believed that their forefathers lived in an age when employment and money were to be had for the asking, just as the villeins believed Domesday Book would show that their ancestors had all been free. Yet it is not difficult to perceive that a guilds-man who had saved a few pounds would be glad to employ some less fortunate weaver, who would be content to work for the privilege of selling a portion of the cloth he helped to make. This is the beginning of the distinction between employer and employed. It is, of course, capable of any extension ; and a guilds-man would naturally assume the power of giving work to a subordinate who was not a member of a guild. Thus the provident guilds-man was developed into the manufacturer, his poorer or less thrifty brother into the mere 'hand'; but the latter passed through an intermediate stage when he was half working-man and half retail dealer. Of his own free will he elected to be wholly working-man, and there can be little doubt that when he made the choice he was the best judge of what would be to his own interest.

The time at which printing was introduced into England, remarkable for other coincidences, is remarkable also as the time at which classes began New grouping of classes. to be grouped anew, and to show, as a whole, some indication of the shape which they were to take in later times. While villenage was being extinguished, partly through the action of the villeins themselves, partly through the preaching of the Lollards, and partly through the assistance of the towns, there began to be a new relation established between man and man. In previous times, when wealth had been amassed in trade, it had been amassed by the ship-owner and the money-lender; it now began to be amassed by the employer of labour in new and extended fields of industry. Not only the master cloth-weavers but the owners of mines were becoming sufficiently prosperous to find that there were difficulties in dealing with large bodies of workmen who demanded payment in coin alone. In other branches of commerce Englishmen began to feel that they need not be wholly dependent on imports for a supply, and their native genius began so far to display itself that they even succeeded in establishing an export trade in guns.

Not the least curious feature in the history of our towns during this period is the persistence of the guild social or religious in its old form and in full vitality, while the craft-guild, though still existing, was losing its original character and showing signs of old age. Reference has already been made to the ordinances of various guilds returned to Parliament in the year 1388. Later records show not only that the social or religious guilds continued to be an important element in town life, but that they were sufficiently popular to obtain new endowments and a new constitution as late as the latter half of the fifteenth century. Though there was much in their traditions which was evil, there was much in their practice which was good. They are a connecting link between that spirit of partisanship, with all the attendant lawlessness, which prevailed before the Conquest and those associations for mutual aid and charity which are the pride of the nineteenth century. Of the ill which they did enough has already been said; it is but fair to say a little of the benefits which they conferred, at any rate, in later times.

The religious or social guilds; their relation to earlier and later times.

A guild which was not instituted for trading purposes of any kind was connected with a church in some town or city; and the same church might have more than one such guild attached to it. Thus of two guilds, in the parish church of Houghton, one was described as the guild, brotherhood, or fraternity of the Holy Trinity, another as the guild of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Some of the members, in almost every case, were, according to the terms of the ordinances, to be men and some women. On stated days the brothers and sisters assembled at the church to which they belonged. They were all clad in the uniform of the guild, and bore lights as part of the religious ceremony which was to be celebrated. After prayers they marched to their guild-hall, where the board was spread, and where ale flowed as freely as was becoming. In a large town the streets were almost continually enlivened by processions of these numerous guilds, with their music, their lights, their wreaths of leaves and of flowers.

It was not, however, by what they did to justify our forefathers in describing the mother country as Merrie England that the social guilds best deserve to be remembered. They were to the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries what the Burial Club, the Friendly Society, and the Insurance Office are to the nineteenth ; and they even rendered assistance to a brother or sister in misfortunes which could now be lightened only by an appeal to private friendship or to public sympathy. Not only did they aid to bury the dead, to nurse the sick, to feed the aged and the orphans, to succour those whom a fire had left homeless ; they sent a friendly messenger to a brother or sister cast into prison, they made a purse for those whom robbers had brought to destitution, they even found a portion for guild-maidens whose fathers had not sufficient wealth. In spite of all their disbursements on behalf of their own members, their connexion with the Church caused them, like the Church itself, to grow rich ; and out of their endowments they sometimes assisted a casual wayfarer or pilgrim, relieved some of the poor of the town in which they were established, and even built alms-houses for the permanent support of the impotent. That their social meetings led to some irregularities is by no means improbable, if the character of the age is borne in mind ; and some unfriendly reports of free living may have caused at last the dissolution of the religious guilds at the same time as the dissolution of the monasteries. It would be idle to regret that they perished when their time had come, for they would have been ill-suited to towns in which the population is numbered by millions, and they would have perpetuated that narrowness of mind which refused charity to all but the orthodox, and which prompted a brother who was a juryman to swear hard in favour of a brother who was a criminal. But the brighter side of these associations reflects not a little light upon the good work which the towns were doing, and enables us to discern how the liberality of modern times has grown out of the restricted sympathies of the past, as they in turn grew out of the still more slender sympathies which had preceded them.

We have now seen what were the chief movements which, during a century and a half after the Black Death, were preparing the future of England. We have seen the bondsmen chafing under their bondage and ready to make common cause with any one—gentleman or outcast, Royal Duke or Lollard preacher—who would aid them to gain their freedom. We have seen heresy burnt out for a time at the stake, only, like the Phoenix, to rise again from its own ashes. We have seen Wycliffe giving the Scriptures to the people in the vulgar tongue, and accused by the opposers of progress of throwing pearls before swine. We have seen printing come to the aid of a growing thirst for knowledge. We have seen the towns not only increasing in wealth and strength, but able to extend a helping hand to the villeins, to threaten the extinction of villenage, and to transfer labour not only from place to place, but from the position of a lord's due to that of the labourer's property with a market-value of its own.

In all this we see the infancy of modern society, but the obstructions to its growth without the town gates had been little if at all diminished since the days of the Black Death. The study of the Roman Civil Law, which had expanded the views of lawyers in the thirteenth century, and the earlier part of the fourteenth, was afterwards made to serve the party spirit of a class. The clergy—and especially the monastic houses—always anxious to extend their possessions, had always shown much ingenuity in evading the law. It was necessary for them to obtain the king's licence before they could legally acquire and hold lands in mortmain. But by various subterfuges they continued to increase their wealth and to get the better alike of the common law and of various statutes made to assist it. Towards the end of the reign of Edward III., and perhaps earlier, it became an ordinary practice to grant land in such a manner that the fee was conveyed nominally to certain persons, who held only for the benefit of a religious house. By this device the religious house escaped all penalties, and yet took all the profits of the land conveyed. A statute was passed in the reign of Richard II. which must at least have checked, if it did not put an end to, the practice, by declaring conveyances of land to the use of religious corporations as much subject to the law of mortmain as a direct conveyance of land to religious corporations themselves. But the introduction of uses, fraudulent as it was in intent, had a permanent effect upon English law.

Recapitulation : Progress made in the 15th century.

It is not a little remarkable that the incongruous union of Roman with feudal doctrines, designed to further the wishes of individuals in opposition to the commands of king and parliament, received in the end a legal sanction, and produced an offspring in which the modern conveyancer has the most implicit trust. During the Wars of the Roses to progress :

Obstructions
evasions of the feudal Mortmain law
by the clergy.

Incongruous union of the Roman Law
with the feudal land-
laws.

the conveyance to uses, like the entail, was commonly employed to secure lands against forfeiture for treason. At the time, it served the purpose for which it was intended, so far as any legal subtlety could serve that purpose in an age when might was stronger than right. But by a curious retribution the very scheme which was devised to increase the wealth of the Church, and used to preserve the power of the barons, became in later days the instrument which rendered the transfer of land comparatively easy, and aided to change the relative position of classes. It has been shown how commerce was almost of necessity polluted by fraud in its early existence in England; fraud, too, was the almost inevitable accompaniment of the purchase and sale of land, when land in England began to be bought and sold with more freedom than the old feudal system had permitted. The difficulties which lawyers of our own time perceive in any attempt to pass land more easily from hand to hand are difficulties which can be traced back to the first application of uses. The principles to which it has given rise have been simplified as far as simplification seems possible; and our alternative is to accept a cumbrous machinery, which enables purchases and settlements to be made with tolerable security, or to sweep away every vestige of antiquity, and to open between the past and the future a great gulf, which might, perhaps, cause a landholder to tremble for the fate of his grandchildren. This is the penalty we pay for the disingenuous arts by which our forefathers strove to make themselves stronger than the laws of England.

In other respects the mere forms of the law underwent little change during this period, and that little was without immediate effect upon the manners of the people.

The names of criminal proceedings had long been very nearly what they are now; there had been nominally the same Courts, the same Judges, the same Justices of the Peace, the same Trial by Jury.

Absence of improvement in legal procedure: the jurors still witnesses; perjuries.

Yet all was as different from the present administration of justice as that is from the rude legal devices of any half-civilised people. In civil cases, indeed, the trial was more like that of modern times than the criminal; a jury was empanelled, documents were produced, and witnesses were examined in court. But even in civil causes the jurors were chosen from the neighbourhood in which the suit arose, and were expected to give a verdict not simply upon the evidence laid before them, but also upon their own knowledge of the facts. If they pronounced in favour of the weaker party, they always had before them the danger of an attain— which was equivalent to a prosecution for perjury. When they were convicted, their goods were seized, their meadows were ploughed up, their woods were felled, their houses were demolished, and they were themselves committed to gaol, and declared to be ever after infamous and incapable of taking an oath in a Court of Record. A wholesome warning to perjurers, no doubt, and one which a Chief Justice of England who lived in the reign of Henry VI. considered sufficient to check the crime of perjury! But in Fortescue's 'Praises of the Laws of England,' it is easier to detect the hand of the panegyrist and the courtier than to discover the true condition of the country. A statute of that very reign, like innumerable preceding and succeeding documents, bears testimony to the almost incurable habit of forswearing themselves, which jurors and compurgators had contracted in the long course of centuries. This could never be amended until, on the one hand, partisanship lost some of its power through the weakening of the barons, and, on the other hand, a clear distinction was drawn between jurors with unbiassed minds and witnesses who laid the facts before them.

In criminal trials it does not appear that during Fortescue's term of office the law had advanced so far as to permit the examination of witnesses in court. ^{Tre: of tl} The indictment, indeed, was a record of the ^{: the 'peine forte et du} finding of the Grand Jury, themselves at once the witnesses and the accusers. This, or the depositions of approvers extorted in gaol by threats or by torture, or the criminal's own confession on the rack, or in answer to a judge's examination, must have been the evidence upon which men were hanged and women were burnt.

It has, indeed, been denied that the use of torture was known to the English law. That it was known, however, is certain, though it was not legally permitted, except by licence from the King or Council. In one form, too, it could be applied by order of a judge, not indeed to extract evidence, but to make a mute prisoner plead, or to punish him for not pleading. Before the infliction of this 'peine forte et dure,' the accused was warned three times of the penalty which would attend obstinate silence, and allowed a few hours for consideration. If the prisoner, whether man or woman, still persisted, there was pronounced the Judgment of Penance : —That you be taken back to the prison whence you came, to a low dungeon into which no light can enter ; that you be laid on your back on the bare floor, with a cloth round your loins, but elsewhere naked ; that there be set upon your body a weight of iron as great as you can bear—and greater ; that you have no sustenance, save, on the first day, three morsels of the coarsest bread, on the second day three draughts of stagnant water from the pool nearest to the prison door, on the third day again three morsels of bread as before, and such bread and such water alternately from day to day until you die.

A person accused of felony, however innocent, had no protection except the right of challenging jurors, no means of preserving the legal descent of his lands to his heir, when he feared a just or unjust conviction, except silence and the resolution to endure the press—for in felonies, short of Treason, standing mute was not equivalent to a conviction. No one could be certain that he would not some day be at the mercy of any scoundrel whom malice or the duress of prison incited to mention his name—unless he happened to possess the good-will of his neighbours; and the good-will of neighbours was, in those days, not to be purchased for so small a price as mere innocence. Chief Justice Fortescue, who praises in one work the laws of England as the best that had ever been known, praises, in another, the English character for qualities which will hardly command admiration in modern times. He preferred theft with violence to theft without; and he has bequeathed his sentiments to posterity in a few words which tell more of the tone of society than many a bulky volume. More men, he says, were hanged in England in one year for robbery or manslaughter than in France in seven, because the English had better hearts; the Scotchmen, also did not dare to rob, but only committed larcenies.

These words bring before us the greatest impediment to the towns in their struggle against that spirit of lawlessness which had been introduced after the fall

Continued
lawlessness :
remarkable sentiment of Chief Justice
Fortescue.

of the Roman Empire, which Englishmen of the rural districts were prone to regard as an inherited virtue, and with which the country infected, to a less extent, even the towns themselves. Those Better Hearts, for which the Chief Justice of England had a tender regard, were the great support of traditional institutions, or, to use more accurate language, of traditional disorder. But as excellence of any kind is deserving of respect, and as the days of chivalry were now drawing to a close, there may be some advantage in glancing at the deeds of knighthood without the walls, as well as at the humbler, but more fruitful efforts of the burghers within. There is no doubt that the knights of those days had great hearts in the old sense of the term, and it would be unjust to depreciate the value of physical courage in moments of national danger. Fortunately, the industry and care of a great lawyer have secured to us a view of chivalry in its best aspect; and though regret can hardly be caused by the extinction of those knightly instincts which prompted men to incessant deeds of arms, unmixed blame can hardly be awarded to men who strove to render victory an art and the concealment of pain a science.

The 'Great
Hearts' of the English:
Chivalry in its best aspect.

A treatise which was copied for the use of Sir Matthew Hale tells us how the best among those better hearts which were the glory of old England prepared themselves for the Trial by Battle in cases of Treason. It has thus a direct bearing upon the History of Crime, and illustrates incidentally the customs and the sentiments of the period. It was compiled early in the reign of Henry VI. by John Hill, who describes himself as Armourer and Sergeant in the Office of Armoury with King Henry IV. and King Henry V.

The 'Battle of Treason' described by a Royal Ar-mourer.

‘The first honour in arms,’ he says, ‘is that a gentleman fight and win the field, either as appellant or as defendant, in his Sovereign Lord’s quarrel, in a battle of treason sworn within lists, before the Sovereign Lord himself.’

As in a court of law, the appellant had a counsel who was assigned to him before the Constable and the Marshal, and who was bound to teach him ‘all manner of fightings and subtleties of arms that belong to a battle sworn.’ Not the least responsible duty of this counsel was to take care that the appellant was properly clad and armed. The minute details which the armourer gives are of value only to the antiquary ; but the object which was to be kept in view in all the preparations is of far higher interest. The perfection of the armour and arms was, of course, a subject of anxious forethought ; but it was considered even less important to protect the champion and give him the best weapons of offence than to conceal the wounds he might receive from his adversary. To this intent he was provided with shoes made of red leather, and with red hose to draw over his leg-harness or greaves ‘because his adversary shall not lightly espy his blood, for in all other colours blood will lightly be seen.’ Such deliberate valour as is indicated in these precautions deserves, beyond doubt, to be called noble ; and it is because knights were as brave and as calm in battle as in their own chambers that their contemporaries and the men who lived after them acquired the habit of summing up all the virtues in the one word—Chivalry.

It was also a part of the counsel’s duty to engage three priests, each of whom was to sing a mass on the day of battle—one the Mass of the Trinity, one the Mass of the Holy Ghost, and one the Mass of Our Lady, or of any saint or saints to whom the knight had sworn devotion. Throughout the night before the encounter a light was kept burning in the champion's room and his counsel watched him and observed how he slept. In the morning he went to church. His harness was laid out at the north end of the altar and covered with a cloth; the Gospel was read over it, the three masses were sung, and at the end of the third a priest gave a blessing. He then repaired to the field fully armed and ready for the conflict; he sent his counsel to the King with a request that he might have free entry when he came to the barriers, and that a chair or tent might be set up for his use. The request was, of course, granted, and he approached with his confessor, counsel, armourer, and servants. His counsel bore before him a long sword, a short sword, and a dagger. At the barrier he was met by the Constable and Marshal, who said, 'What art thou?' He told his name and the cause of his coming, and was then admitted with his followers.

As he entered 'he blessed himself soberly, and so twice,' ere he approached his Sovereign Lord. And twice he and his counsel did their obeisance before they came to the steps of the king's seat. They knelt, and, as they rose again, again made obeisance. They then went back to the tent, but, before entering it, turned round once more, and once more made obeisance to the king.

When the defendant appeared on the field the appellant again left his tent, and stood fully armed, 'taking heed of his adversary's coming in, and of his countenance, that he might take comfort of it.' The weapons of both parties were then brought before the King and examined in his presence by the Constable and Marshal. If there was no fault in the arms the appellant was immediately afterwards summoned to the First Oath.

When the appellant had sworn to the truth of his accusation before the king, he returned, with the same formalities as before, to his tent. His counsel, who had carefully noted the terms of his oath, remained in the king's presence to hear what was sworn by the defendant. Unless the defendant swore that 'every word and every syllable of every word' sworn by the appellant was false, the appellant's counsel might ask judgment without further ceremony. But if the defendant swore as required, the counsel returned again to the appellant's chair to await the summons for taking the Second Oath. The Second Oath was followed by the Third Oath, and if the appellant persisted in making his accusation every time in the same terms, and the defendant every time denied it without equivocation, evasion, or cavil, the tents were removed and the lists prepared for the actual battle. Upon this the appellant's counsel asked for a place within the bar on the king's right hand. 'The cause is this—that such pity may be given to the king, of God, that none of them shall die that day.' The counsel remained in the place assigned till the king had given his judgment. But should the king not see fit to stay the trial, the order was given to cry 'Laissez Aller,' and the champions fought to the death.

There is a ground on which, perhaps, this mode of trial might be justified; it was the most merciful to the person accused of treason, as there was no other hope for one whom a dominant party had resolved to destroy. Yet what must we think of an age in which it was common for knight to be matched against knight in a deadly conflict—not as gladiator was matched against gladiator in the Roman arena, for a show, but with a solemn appeal to religion, and with a mockery

Single combat
and the spirit of private
war.

of the forms of law? It was only the persistence of the petty spirit of private war which could have kept such an institution in existence in a country in which there was already a growing love of commerce and even of letters.

One purpose, indeed, it might have been made to serve, and might be made to serve even now, could the supreme commanders of mighty armies be persuaded to disband their hosts, and to stake their hopes of conquest upon the issue of a single combat—emperor with emperor, king with king. Unfortunately, however, the experiment was tried without success in the days of chivalry—when, in spite of oaths and appeals to God, monarchs had a latent though more operative faith in favourable opportunities and in strong battalions. Richard II., in the ardour of youth, sent a challenge to the king of France to meet him in single combat, or in a combat in which only the two kings and the three uncles of each should take part, or in a battle to be fought with the whole forces of the two kingdoms on a day and at a place appointed beforehand. By the issue he wished the war begun in the reign of Edward III. to be decided, and all matters in dispute to be settled. The reason he gave is certainly much to his credit, but was in direct opposition to the martial spirit of his age, and was little likely to elevate him in the estimation of his contemporaries. He wished, he said, to stay the effusion of Christian blood, the desolation of the land, the deflowering of virgins, the violation of married women, and all those sufferings of innocent persons which were too numerous and too horrible to be described by the pen or even put into language. His captains, no doubt, laughed at this extraordinary outburst of humanity, and lost all respect for a sovereign who shuddered at the screams of a woman or a few drops of Frenchman's blood. Had Richard's challenge been accepted, and his opinions too, the battle of Azincour would never have been fought, and there would have been less glory for Englishmen. But the soil of France would not have been stained with English blood, the Maid of Orleans would not have been burnt at Rouen, and the English and French nations might in later times have been friends instead of enemies. The whole struggle of the English kings to gain possession of the French throne was neither better nor worse than the struggles of a feudal lord to gain possession of his neighbour's manor. The common people in both countries could only lose by war. The king of England might have succeeded in making Paris his capital and England itself a mere province, and thus might have gratified an utterly selfish ambition. For this object men had to die and women to weep, and when at length the conflict ceased, and the balance was struck, it appeared that England was the richer only in the possession of some rolls of parchment in which dead monarchs were proudly styled Kings of England and of France.

Single combat might have been useful in national disputes: challenge of Richard II. to the French king.

The generous sentiment which prompted Richard II. to spare human blood and suffering in war is, perhaps, to be detected in one of the earlier statutes of his reign, by which an attempt was made to stay the ancient and knightly practice of forcible entry. Richard, indeed, was only a boy when the Act was passed, but he was a boy who had shown self-reliance at the time of Wat Tyler's rebellion, and who differed from the nobles about him in being less resolutely brutal. The townsmen, it is possible, may have

Private war, and forcible entry : Statute against forcible entry.

begun to discern that private war, as well as war with foreign nations, was directly opposed to their interests, and the burgesses in parliament may have availed themselves of the opportunity presented by Richard's minority to place upon record a protest against the lawlessness of the kingdom. There can, however, be little doubt that the young king's sympathies were with them, and that any influence he might have possessed with his advisers was exerted in favour of order and against the prevailing love of bloodshed.

The Statute against Forcible Entries had for many generations little more effect than Richard's protest against the slaughter of subjects and the burning of homes for the purpose of determining the territory over which a king should rule, or the principles according to which a crown should descend. It will be shown in another volume that the old habit long seemed ineradicable, and was not sensibly checked until the powerful house of Tudor put in force a much abused but useful machinery to root the evil out. Richard II. was quite powerless against the barons; and ten years after the passing of the Act against forcible entry he was persuaded or compelled to make a grant, such as might have been made in the days of Stephen or of Edward the Confessor. He gave to John Devereux, knight, the castle and manor of Leonhale, in Herefordshire, with all its liberties and franchises, among which he mentioned expressly the trial, judgment, and punishment, alike of Englishmen and Welshmen, for theft, robbery, murder, or any other crime perpetrated on the manor; and he provided that disuse on the part of Devereux's predecessor should be no bar to the exercise by him of this private jurisdiction. It is true that the castle was on

The Statute
ineffectual;
private jurisdiction.

the Welsh Marches, which, with the Marches towards Scotland, were the most disturbed, and therefore the most lawless parts of the kingdom. But to create or to strengthen any private jurisdiction at all was to throw back indefinitely the prospect of a firm and settled government, which should be peaceably acknowledged throughout the realm. A sanction given to a baron or knight, in the independent exercise of an authority which, in a well-ordered government, belongs to the State or to its head, was an encouragement to the assertion of independence in every other form—to forcible entry, to private war, and even to general civil war itself.

The chief good effected by the Statute against forcible entry, and of the statutes against engaging retainers and giving them liveries enacted in the same reign, was in the way of suggestion to later sovereigns and later parliaments. In subsequent reigns attempts, long destined to be vain, were made at intervals to enforce the provisions of these Acts, and even to assimilate the course of procedure within liberties enjoying private jurisdictions to that of the realm at large. These early efforts, prompted in part by a desire to extend the royal authority, in part by the desire of the townsmen for a more settled government, were useful, if for no other purpose, at least to inform posterity what was the actual condition of the country. Thus Henry VI. and his Council in Parliament ordain, in accordance with the terms of a petition, that no lord shall knowingly receive, cherish, hold in household, or maintain brigands, robbers, oppressors of the people, manslaughterers, felons, outlaws, or ravishers of women. They forbid the giving of liveries or tokens, the bribing against retainers and liveries also ineffectual.

Statutes

of judges, and maintenance in every form, and they require all who have the privilege of excluding the king's officers from any liberties to summon suspected persons, and exact an oath for the observance of these provisions. The most important of the privileged districts were the Counties Palatine. But the very existence of the Counties Palatine and of similar little kingdoms within the kingdom of England was opposed to the whole spirit of the ordinance. The holders of these liberties acted as though they were bound to enforce obedience from their inferiors, but not to give obedience themselves. They had kingly powers, and thought themselves entitled to act as kings. Thus, in spite of statutes, ordinances, and commissions, we find the Bishop of Durham becoming party to a deed by which one Sir William Eure agrees to be his retainer against all men in peace and in war, upon condition of receiving twenty pounds a year; and the deed appears without concealment upon the rolls of the Bishop's Chancery.

The evils which can be traced back to the days when barbarous tribes and petty chieftains settled on the ruins of Roman civilisation were, it seems, but little abated after the lapse of a thousand years. They were evils which had existed before Rome became great, and which are character-
The force of ancient custom and the force of material progress evenly balanced istic of uncivilised or half-civilised peoples. They had disappeared, or nearly disappeared, with the growth of wealth and the increase of culture in the Roman towns; and like causes were destined once again to produce like effects, though the time was not yet come. During the Wars of the Roses, and immediately afterwards, two forces were almost evenly balanced—the force of ancient custom, which was in fact lawlessness, in the rural districts, and the force of material progress, which was preparing the establishment of order, in the towns. A remarkable form in which the opposition of these two forces to each other displayed itself was the charge of 'Scandalum Magnatum.'

As early as the reign of Edward I., when the towns had just succeeded in obtaining their charters, a statute was passed which made it a grave offence to devise or tell any false news of prelates, dukes, earls, barons, or nobles of the realm. Others, too, were enumerated as being within the meaning of the act—the Chancellor, the Justices of either Bench, and all the great officers of state; but they were named after the territorial magnates, and the majesty of the law was set beneath the dignity of rank. The reasons both for the passing of the statute and for the terms in which it was passed are easily enough to be traced in the manners of the times. When the great landholder arrogated to himself the privileges of a little king, he naturally regarded evil speech against his kingship as a crime closely akin to Treason, and very different from evil speech directed by one petty trader against another. 'Scandalum Magnatum,' however, could hardly be committed until there had grown up a somewhat powerful class, distinct from that of the magnate, his retainers, and villeins. The evil which he saw in the rise of this new class was far less formidable under Edward I. than it had become under Richard II., when, however, the landholders had no difficulty in re-enacting the ancient statute and adding more stringent provisions.

It is about the time when we may believe the disorganisation following the Black Death and the insurrection of the villeins had begun to strengthen, relatively at least,

Charges of
'Scandalum Magnatum' associated with the growth of a new class.

the population of the towns that the offence of slandering great personages comes into notice, not only in the statute-book, but through definite accusations. One Case of Sibille and the Earl of Oxford. Walter Sibille, a citizen of London, is accused in Parliament of having uttered slanderous words concerning Robert Vere, Earl of Oxford. The chief point in the alleged slander was that Sibille had attributed to the Earl a practice which was notoriously common among all the great landholders—the practice of maintenance, or in other words, of supporting with his influence and wealth, both in law courts and out of them, those retainers who had sworn to serve him, right or wrong, in peace or in war, against all other men. Sibille was condemned to pay five hundred marks, and was committed to prison until payment should be made. There he probably remained during the remainder of his life, unless he was a man of extraordinary wealth.

A case which shows still more clearly how deadly a weapon the charge of ‘Scandalum Magnatum’ could be made in the hands of a powerful noble is that of John Cavendish, a fishmonger of London. Case of Cavendish and Michael de la Pole, the Chancellor. He accused in Parliament Michael de la Pole, then Chancellor, of partiality and bribery. After the charge and the answer had been heard, the matter was referred to the King’s Justices, who assumed that the Chancellor was innocent, committed his accuser to prison, and imposed a fine of a thousand marks for the slander. Pole happened, at that time, to be stronger than the party opposed to him, and to have the power of crushing an adversary. But only three years later he was again accused of corruption, and of that kind of corruption alleged against him by Cavendish—of letting records be rased, and judgments sold with impunity, and of procuring pardon for murderers and traitors in order to fill his own coffers. Whether the Chancellor was innocent or guilty it is now impossible to ascertain ; but it is quite certain that a swift retribution was in store for all who ventured, even in the ordinary course of law, to accuse any man of rank of having done wrong, unless the accuser was supported by a stronger party than the accused.

In some instances there can be little doubt that a scandalous and unfounded charge was the instrument employed to destroy an enemy, and that the persons who fabricated it were most justly punished. A Sir Ralph, or Lord, Ferriers was accused of having entered into treasonable correspondence with the French, of having suggested an invasion of England, and of having named a favourable day for an advance upon London. The evidence against him was a packet of letters written apparently by him, and with his seal attached, and addressed to the French Admiral and other French nobles. He declared in Parliament that he was innocent, and requested that he might have counsel to defend him. This, as in cases of far later date, was refused, and he was remanded to prison. His friends, however, made strenuous exertions to save him, and, upon a second hearing, some facts were brought to light which certainly ought to have been known and examined before he was placed under restraint. The letters had been found by a beggar in a field in the suburbs of London : so at least the beggar had told the Lord Mayor. But a mere glance at them was sufficient to expose a most clumsy imposture. There were in the same packet letters purporting to be written by Ferriers to Frenchmen, and letters purporting to be written by Frenchmen to Ferriers, and all written in the same hand.

Fabrication of false charges : case of Ferriers and the Beggar.

The seal too, though in other respects well imitated, was found to be of a different size from that used by Ferriers; and it was held to be beyond a doubt that some of his enemies had attempted to ruin him by conspiracy and forgery. He was acquitted, and the beggar was sent to prison under suspicion.

In his anxiety to prove his innocence, Ferriers used an argument which is an unpleasant commentary upon knightly deeds and knightly sentiments. He had had command of the English garrison at Calais; and he alleged that, had he wished to play the traitor, he might again and again have received a heavy bribe from the French to deliver up the place to them, just as other English commanders had delivered up other fortresses for money. This charge of treason in its most degrading form—the treason which would betray national interests to a foreign enemy for gain—was rife throughout the period included in the present chapter. At the beginning of the reign of Richard II., the Rolls of Parliament teem with accusations against officers who had, as alleged, accepted French gold for the surrender of strongholds in the hands of English troops. Now a Weston, now a Cressingham, now an Elingham, a Trivett, a Ferriers, and a Farndon in the same accusation, have their names inscribed on the records of the National Assembly as traitors who have sold their own and the national honour for a paltry fee from a hostile commander. We cannot know with certainty whether these men were guilty or not. But we can at least perceive that to make terms, rather than fight to the death or starve, suggested, not without good reason, a suspicion of foul play in an age when true knights donned red against English knights of surrendering fortresses for bribes.

Charges

buskins over their armour, so that none might know how much blood was flowing from their wounds.

Whether Englishmen were betrayed or not, it was an evil sign for England that they were continually crying 'We are betrayed!' Either there was a party The cry of 'We are betrayed!' in Parliament whose trade it was to make these foul accusations, regardless of truth, or the men who were accused were guilty of the offence. Sometimes it happens that the sum received is mentioned in the record—as, for instance, the sum of twenty thousand francs in the joint charge against Elingham and his associates. Sometimes, too, a very feeble answer was made by the accused, who ended by submitting themselves to the King's mercy. And if, in some cases, there is reason to suspect that an unfortunate soldier was ruined by the personal animosity of an adversary, the suspicion is little creditable to our forefathers, and cannot wholly remove a foul blot from our national archives.

These charges disappear for a time, while the English arms are successful in France, but are renewed Charges of corruption against William de la Pole. as soon as misfortune again lends them some sort of colour. William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, was accused of an intrigue to establish his own son on the throne of England, through a royal marriage and the aid of the French king. He had lent his influence, it was said, in favour of releasing the Duke of Orleans, who had been taken prisoner at the battle of Azincour, in order that the French might the more easily recover their lost provinces from the English, and might thus be disposed to favour his pretensions. He had, it was said, disclosed the king's counsel to the Bastard of Orleans and others of the French nation, and informed them of the strength of the English ordnance and ammudition in France. He had, it was said, delayed the shipping of English arms for use against the French, and had actually delivered up a portion of the English conquests in France without any authority.

Could it be said that regularity was known in trials for treason as early as the reign of Henry VI., the manner of dealing with the charge against Suffolk would deserve to be called extremely ^{His fate.} irregular. The king alone gave a decision, and expressed an opinion not indeed that Suffolk was innocent but that the grave charges against him had not been proven. On the other hand, the king pronounced that the Earl had been guilty of such trivial offences as were commonly imputed to men who had had any opportunity of committing them—of inciting sheriffs to tamper with writs for the hindrance of justice, of procuring the king's pardon for the sheriffs who had been guilty of maintaining wrong doers, of staying processes of outlawry—in fact of abusing power in every way short of treason. Henry's sentence upon him for these venial errors of judgment was banishment for five years. His enemies, however, according to the custom of the time, resolved that their work should not be half done. It was not very difficult to find a sea-captain, hardened by many years of piratical adventure, who would name his price for committing a murder. Soon after the ship, which was to carry Suffolk into exile, had sailed from Dover, it was boarded by some ruffians who were on the watch for him. His head was struck off and his body thrown into the sea.

In reading of those crimes which were the most conspicuous part of public life, it would be difficult to fix upon any one point in which the non-trading classes were better in the reign of Richard III. than they had been in the reign of Edward II. The events which occur under Edward II., occur with little variation, except in the names of the actors, under Richard II. ; they repeat themselves again and again during the Wars of the Roses, and have changed their form but little when Edward V. and his brother are murdered in the Tower. That tenacity of purpose (unrestrained by any consideration of right or wrong) which marks the age of chivalry, displays itself, with a sickening sameness, in deeds of blood which no lord or knight hesitated to do when he wished to preserve what he had gained or take to himself what belonged to another. In those days men supped, indeed, full of horrors ; and we who live in a happier age cannot know our own good fortune, except by contemplating, for a little while at least, that bygone time in its true aspect. We cannot realise to ourselves the persistence of the same spirit through many generations, except by abandoning the antiquated method of the annalist who made a catalogue of facts for each year, and omitted to show the likeness of one year to another.

One of the many atrocious crimes committed in the reign of Richard II. was the murder of the Duke of Gloucester. It was such a deed as would be a private execution, without any preceding trial, of a Liberal or Conservative leader by opposing Conservative or Liberal ministers, with the alleged cognisance of the sovereign—the sovereign being the nephew of the victim. The Duke was arrested and shipped off to Calais. An accusation of treason was then prepared against him and other nobles. But when a warrant was sent to the Earl Marshal, then Governor of Calais, to bring him to England for trial, the answer returned was that he had already died of apoplexy. His real fate was probably told by one John Hall, a servant of the Duke of Norfolk, in subsequent proceedings in Parliament. Hall confessed that he met at Calais three of Norfolk's esquires, and some members of Norfolk's household, a valet or yeoman of the chamber to the Duke of Albemarle, and William Scarle, a valet or yeoman of the chamber to King Richard. They were acting under Norfolk's orders, and, with a strange appeal to religion, they were all 'sworn upon the Body of Christ, before a certain chaplain of St. George in the Church of Our Lady of Calais, that they would not disclose' the murder which they were about to perpetrate.

Absence of improvement in the tone of rival parties : atrocious deeds of bloodshed.

Murder of a Duke of Gloucester.

After this ceremony they went towards a house called The Prince's Inn, and the Duke of Norfolk with them. Norfolk bade them enter, and left them to their task. Soon afterwards Gloucester was brought to the house. When he saw the valets of the king and of Albemarle, he said, with deliberate irony, 'Now I see I shall do well.' He was then conducted to a chamber, where he was told it was the king's will that he should die. He answered, 'If it so be, welcome Death.' The two valets requested him to see a chaplain and make his last confession. To this he assented, and the preparations for the solemn murder were complete.

Gloucester was then made to lie down, a feather-bed was thrown over him, and, while some of the other murderers held its sides, the two valets lay upon the top, throwing their weight upon the Duke's mouth. The pious ruffians who took no active part in the crime fell on their knees around the bed, and wept, and prayed for Gloucester's soul, while Hall, the informer, kept the door.

Hall gained nothing by betraying his accomplices.

It seemed to the Lords, as it is expressed on the Roll of Parliament, that he had deserved as grievous a death as could be adjudged to him, 'because the Duke of Gloucester was so exalted a personage.' The sentence passed upon him was like the sentence in cases of treason—that he should be drawn from Tower Hill to Tyburn gallows, and disembowelled; that his bowels should be burned before him; that his body should be hanged, and afterwards beheaded and quartered; that his head should be sent to Calais, where the deed was done, and there set up; and that his quarters should be at the king's pleasure. 'And execution was done the same day.'

It was an event so thoroughly in accordance with the lack of justice commonly shown in high places as hardly to deserve notice, that Gloucester was declared guilty of treason after his death. His case differs from many others not because he was condemned unheard, but because he was made a traitor by the retraction of a previous pardon. The power, now and long afterwards exercised by Parliament, of proceeding by Bill of Attainder, was simply a power of effecting that which could not, with certainty, be effected by the ordinary legal processes.

By no mere coincidence it happened that another Duke of Gloucester, in the reign of Henry VI., half a century later, was also suddenly accused of treason, was also found dead in a bed, and was also generally believed to have been murdered, like many another noble, and like the two kings, Edward II., and Richard II. Murder was not then, as it is now, considered a crime of terrible heinousness: it was simply one of the most ordinary means of gaining any important end.

Attainder
after death.

Similar fate of another Duke of Gloucester.

We have seen how Richard II., when little more than a boy, showed some generous instincts, without any lack of courage. The times in which he lived transformed him, before he reached his prime, into a man without the resolute will of less scrupulous man-slayers, and without the consistent virtue which commands the respect of posterity. He could not reign except by the aid of crime; and the crimes which were as nothing to his ministers made him ashamed. He ended by being more contemptible than those who had begun by being more criminal. Like Edward II., he was accused of misdeeds which, when committed by a subject, are treason; and, like Edward II., and many subjects who have been called traitors, he was removed from public gaze in a manner which leaves little doubt that he was murdered.

Effect of surrounding circumstances upon the character: Richard II. an illustration.

It is difficult to feel sympathy for any of the actors in these mediæval tragedies. If it were possible to regard the Richard who was dethroned as the Richard who faced the mob of insurgent villeins in London, and wished to fight the French king single-handed, in order to spare the blood of his subjects, there would be few characters in history more deserving of compassion. But the Richard who prompted the murder of his uncle, or consented to it, the Richard who was accused of causing the Rolls of Parliament and other records of the realm to be destroyed, erased, blotted, and re-written, is quite another man. The Richard who said, 'I do confess that I am utterly insufficient and useless for the government of the kingdom, and that, for my notorious misrule, I deserve to be deposed,' is no longer to be recognised as the self-reliant youth who would have given his own life for the good of his people. Nor was this the lowest depth to which he fell. When he abandoned his royal estate, he was reduced to such abject servility that he said he trusted his cousin Henry, who was to succeed him, would be a good lord to him. From one who had never done an evil deed, and who was abdicating of his own free will, such words might have had some grace and dignity ; but it is hard to conceive any expressions more unkingly and more unmanly from a king who had enervated himself by debauchery, and attempted to save his throne by homicide.

Richard II., when he had abandoned his royal rank, disappeared. The uniform process by which the secret crimes of this period brought forth a brood of open misdoers is well worthy of remark. That which happened after the murder of Edward II. happened in a very similar form after the murder of Richard II., and again after the murder of Edward V. and his brother. In our own time morbid brooding over a deed of bloodshed frequently impels the innocent to self-accusation. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the effect of such a deed, when a whisper of it went abroad, was to suggest some practical means of turning it to profit. False personation, or a false report that the king still lived, followed the death or disappearance of each of the three murdered sovereigns. We have already seen how it followed the death of Edward II. ; we have yet to see how it followed the death of Edward V. ; and, in the meantime, this is the most appropriate place to show that it followed the disappearance of Richard II.

A general belief seems to have spread through almost all parts of the kingdom, but especially through Cheshire, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, that Richard had made

Effects of secret crimes :
personators of murdered
kings.

his escape into Scotland, and was there living in retirement. This opinion was of course most dangerous to the new occupant of the throne, and warrants were issued for the arrest of all who had spread it. When Henry IV. was in the fifth year of his reign, he granted a general pardon to all offenders, except William Searle, Richard's valet (who, after having been concerned in the murder of Gloucester, had pretended to carry letters from his dead master), and Thomas Warde, of Trumpington, who had taken the name of the dead king. Warde was the natural successor of the imaginary Edward II., who caused an earl of Kent to fall, the natural predecessor of Lambert Simnel and Perkin Warbeck. Crimes which are alike in their character, are alike in their consequences.

The period included in the present chapter begins at a time when the murder of Edward II. was still within the recollection of men in the prime of life ; it ends ^{Richard III.} with the death of a man who caused his two ^{and} 'chivalry.' nephews to be killed, and who did not scruple to call his mother a harlot in order that he might himself be called a king. But such was the age of chivalry—so far at least as the 'chivalers' were concerned—and all the minor events of life were consistent with the great deeds of usurpers and of chivalrous assassins.

That respect for women which is of modern growth, and which is commonly supposed to be chivalrous, is sought in vain among the records and chronicles of the Middle Ages, and appears only in modern ^{'Chivalry' and the condition of women.} romances, the authors of which have not truly realised the character of the times of which they have written. The wild romances of an earlier date, to which an Eastern tinge was given by the Crusades, abound, it is true, with instances of apparent devotion shown by a knight to his mistress. Yet, even here, it will be found that all the knight promises or does is to maintain against all comers the superior beauty of his lady gay as compared with the lady gay of any other knight. This was, no doubt, gratifying to the vanity of the woman, but did not preserve her either from insults or from hard knocks. We have seen how common was the practice of exposing women, whatever their rank, to the ignominy and indecency of a public penance in the streets of London. Their condition in other respects was in perfect harmony with such exhibitions—hardly less so in the days of Jane Shore than in the days of Alice Perers.

Alice Perers, like Jane Shore, was a king's mistress. She soothed the last hours of Edward III., over whom she acquired such influence that she sat at his bed's head when all the Council stood waiting outside his bed-chamber door. When men could not obtain what they wished by any other means, they commonly made what interest they might with her to gain the good-will of the king, and rarely if ever in vain. Her power, like all other power in those times, excited the envy of the less powerful; but it hardly appears that the openness with which her position was acknowledged was thought a great public scandal. So long as the old king lived she was, probably in a happier condition than any woman in England. As soon as he died the Parliament saw no loss of dignity in declaring all her lands and goods forfeited, and in banishing her from the realm, on pretence that she had been guilty of maintenance—an offence of which few landholders had not been guilty in at least an equal degree. Alice, however, seems to have been very skilful in managing her own affairs, for she married not long afterwards one William Windsor, who obtained restitution of her lands. It is to be feared that the man who would knowingly marry a royal mistress would not prove a better husband than the average knights of his time.

The Mistresses of Kings: Alice Perers.

Among the landholders, an unmarried but virtuous girl seems to have led a far less pleasant life than a royal mistress. Affectionate confidence between parents and children was very rare, if it existed at all; and that ancient spirit which had caused the sale of brides, and made a woman a chattel, was hardly even yet extinct. It was customary for the relatives to seek a husband suitable in wealth and rank, and to arrange a marriage as a matter of business. Until the maiden was wedded she was kept strictly under control; and the kind of discipline which was enforced is well illustrated by a letter written late in the reign of Henry VI. The writer was the widow of a landholder, and she was corresponding with the brother of the young lady whose case she describes and whom she is anxious to serve by finding a husband. This young lady was under the care of her mother, and the following was her condition :— She might not speak with any man, not even with her mother's servants; 'and she had since Easter, the most part, been beaten once in the week or twice, and sometimes thrice in a day, and her head was broken in two or three places.'

Mothers and daughters : chastisement of a young lady.

The only indication of any real improvement in the condition of women since the days of the Black Death was, as might have been expected, in the towns. Not only were the more laborious occupations, at which women had been compelled to work, now falling to the lot of men, but an increase of wealth and luxury was providing for women occupations more befitting their sex. We hear less of female bakers and more of female weavers; and in the reign of Henry VI. we find a complaint made by the female silk-workers in London that Lombards and other foreigners were invading their handicraft, which was one requiring art and skill. The silk-women gained their point, and the Lombards were excluded under a penalty of twenty pounds.

The only improvement in the condition of women was in the towns.

Town-life, however, had as yet effected but little perceptible diminution in crimes of violence even within the towns themselves; and while the 'peine forte et dure' was applied in gaol, riots and affrays were common enough in the law-courts—hardly less common in the reign of Henry VI. than they had been in the reign of Edward III.

The principal Courts sat commonly in 'the Great Hall of Pleas within the King's Palace at Westminster.' One morning the Judges were sitting in the Court of Chancery, in the Court of King's Bench, and in the Court of Common Pleas; and at the same time the Lords Spiritual and Temporal of the King's Council were assembled in another part of the Hall. Court was but imperfectly separated from Court, and the Courts from the Council. The origin of all these bodies from the one ancient Court or Council of the king was still called to mind by the meeting of all under the same roof—and that the roof of the Royal Palace—and by the easy communication from one to another. In the part of the Hall assigned to the Court of King's Bench there suddenly arose a great commotion. The Deputy-Marshal of England was reading a document relating to the Marshal's Office when one Ralph Garneys sprang forward with clenched fist and struck him in the face. In the struggle which ensued the whole of the Courts were thrown into confusion. All the Judges had to leave the Bench, the Council was broken up, and tranquillity was restored only when the Hall was cleared of officers as well as of rioters.

The towns were affected by the lawlessness of the country.

A brawl in Westminster Hall.

A scene not less characteristic of the age was enacted during the same reign in the Star-Chamber. This appears to have been then the meeting-place of the House of Lords rather than of the Committee which was afterwards known as the Star-Chamber Court. Attack on a lord sitting in the Star-Chamber. On one occasion Henry VI. was present with the Lords sitting in Parliament. An esquire named William Talbois had some grievance against Ralph, Lord Cromwell. A number of armed followers appeared with him in the Chamber and made a sudden attack upon Cromwell, who was sitting in his place in Parliament, and whom they nearly succeeded in killing before they were interrupted. Talbois, it is true, was afterwards committed to the Tower, but his enterprise was none the less illustrative of the times; and he lived to be included in a Bill of Attainder passed against Lancastrians in the following reign.

The influence which the example of the townsmen was feebly beginning to exercise upon the landholders was counterbalanced by the influence which the ancient habits of the landholders still exercised Armed retainers riding into the towns to impede the course of justice. upon the townsmen. In spite of statutes and proclamations, the great lords not only engaged retainers, but rode with them armed into the towns. It was only consistent with the old traditions and the crimes perpetrated on every side that attempts should be made to intimidate judges as well as to bribe them. Thus, in the year 1451, when the sessions of Oyer and Terminer were being held at Walsingham, four hundred armed horsemen appeared to support a popular defendant, and effectually over-awed the plaintiffs and their party. No legal forms, however excellent, are of any avail when the whole constitution of society is tainted with hereditary lawlessness.

An effort was made, in the reign of Henry IV., to stay the savage practice of maiming an enemy, which had been introduced, after the Romans left Britain, by the Teutonic invaders, which was, as the Roman Emperor and the laws drawn up in England before the Conquest tell us, a common punishment among barbarians, and which sensibly affected the manners of the nation as late as the reign of George I. Henry assented to a statute which, for the first time, declared that it was a felony to cut out the tongues or put out the eyes of the king's subjects, of malice aforethought. It was not for many a generation afterwards a felony to slit the nose, to cut off the nose or lip, to cut off or disable any of the limbs. The progress indicated even by the law passed under Henry IV. may be judged from the fact that the offences against which it provides are said, in the preamble, to be daily practised.

That modern sentiment, indeed, which jealously protects human life and human blood was still almost unknown. The affection which has often been attributed to the servants of a great feudal lord exhibited itself, at his death, in a furious riot within his house. They could agree in nothing except that the master's goods should be distributed among themselves; and each took and gave hard blows to secure a greater share than his fellows.

Military discipline, when the military spirit was at its

Mutilation still a common offence.

General want of tenderness.

height, was also unknown according to our present ideas of it. The English soldiers, who could not hold France for England, and were to return defeated, if not disgraced, began their campaign by harrying their own country in their march to the port from which they were to sail. There was made in Parliament, in the reign of Henry VI., a piteous complaint from the inhabitants of Dorsetshire, Hampshire, Sussex, Kent, and other counties lying on the sea-coast. Their kinsmen, they said, had been murdered, their wives and daughters ravished, their cattle and goods stolen, by the king's soldiers who had passed that way, and they prayed that some remedy might be provided for the future. These practices, no doubt, were forbidden, but forbidden in vain. In the reign of Edward IV. there was also an expedition to France, and when the soldiers returned they behaved no better than the soldiers of Henry VI. Their crimes were so numerous and excited such bitter outcries that the king in person went with the judges on circuit to try the offenders. It is related, as a remarkable fact, that he allowed even his own domestics to be hanged if they had been caught in the act of robbery or theft.

Brutal conduct of soldiers bound for foreign service.

If soldiers marching to do battle against a foreign enemy committed brutalities in England, which they could hardly surpass in France, it is not difficult to imagine what must have been the sufferings of the country people when English king was fighting English king on English soil. The loss of the French possessions added new bitterness to English quarrels; and the general belief that English garrisons had lost fortresses through treachery was expressed by Jack Cade when he made a charge of such treachery against Sir John Fastolf. It is to this popular belief that we are, in all probability, indebted for Shakspeare's description of Falstaff's ragged regiment, and for many points in Falstaff's character. But neither Jack Cade, whose rebellion may be considered the beginning of the Wars of the Roses, nor the leaders on the side either of York or of Lancaster regarded the misdeeds of their adversaries as food for a comedy. Men were terribly in earnest in those days, even when they played the traitor; and their jokes were, for the most part, grim and practical. It mattered, perhaps, little that housewives thought as much of long-bows and arrows, of cross-bows and bolts, of pole-axes and armour for the defence of their homes, as of furniture for their bedchambers or fittings for their malt-houses. It mattered little that a letter could be sent from one part of England to another only by a trusty special messenger, or by the uncertain hands of a pilgrim or a chapman travelling to a fair. It mattered little that money could not be safely carried in any way from any country town to London, because the roads or paths were infested by thieves. All this was but the ordinary condition of England in time of peace, as that time was called when there were no greater deeds of arms than riots, routs, and affrays, forcible entries, and murders by great gangs of robbers. It mattered not very much that pestilence infected the towns, as pestilence always infects them during wars, for they were so ill-drained and ill-built that they were rarely free from some kind of plague. But worse evils even than these befel the English people during the Wars of the Roses, if we may believe the Petition of the Lords and Commons to Richard, Duke of Gloucester, immediately before he became Richard III., King of England. As usual, a contrast was drawn between the great 'prosperity, honour, and tranquillity' of a past time not definitely fixed and the miseries still fresh in the memory of living men. After that bygone period of happiness, always seen as in a mirage, the rulers of the land, it was declared in Parliament, delighted in adulation, were led astray by sensuality and concupiscence, and followed the counsel of persons who were insolent, vicious, and inordinately avaricious. Felicity was turned into wretchedness, prosperity into adversity; order and the law of God and of man were confounded. The kingdom was ruled by terror, justice was put away and despised, and murder, extortion, and oppression took its place. 'No man was sure of his life, his land, or his livelihood, of his wife, of his daughter, or of his servant; every good maiden and woman standing in dread to be ravished and defouled.'

Horrors of the Civil Wars.

At the accession of Henry VII., which is usually regarded as the time when the dark ages came to an end, and when our modern civilisation began, nearly eleven hundred years had passed since the Romans had left Britain to her own intestine quarrels and to the inroads of pagan pirates, whose chieftains could not write and despised the effeminacy of men who could. From the time when marauders, crossing the German Ocean, had established their supremacy and given the name of England to the south-eastern portion of the island, there had been many customs and many habits of thought which the long centuries had been unable to soften, or even to change. And thus when the first Tudor ascended the throne there was less security for life and property, less love of art and of letters, less of all that culture without which civilisation cannot exist, than there had been when the last legion embarked for Rome.

Less security and less civilisation at the accession of Henry VII. than before the Romans departed.

There was one force at work, however, which was destined to raise England higher among nations than Rome herself had ever risen. England was becoming almost imperceptibly what she had never before been—the land of the free. While the towns, whatever their origin, were sending representatives to a national parliament, the institution of slavery, in its last form of villenage, was gradually dying out even in the country. The towns, whatever their grandeur, had never in the days of the Romans become grand by the aid of free labour. Nor, perhaps, would England have advanced as she did, had not religious discontent formed a bond of union between country and town. There were two kinds of freedom which had long been coveted—freedom of the person from the ownership of a lord, and freedom of the mind from the dictation of a priest whose morals did not command respect. Neither had yet been attained ; but some progress had been made towards the attainment of one, and a great, though long a vain, struggle was about to be made for the other. There was a natural sympathy between the fugitive villein and the enterprising townsman, whose opposition to the landowner in all political matters was hereditary. There were, no doubt, many bad passions excited by the change implied in the emancipation of those villeins who became not copyholders but working manufacturers. Yet to this emancipation the greatness of England is to be traced. The labourer who is not free has little interest in his work, and is little likely to become an inventor. It is to the inventive power of her sons that England owes her wealth and all that her wealth has gained for her. She had many benefactors unknown to fame before Arkwright made her richer by the spinning-jenny, or Watt by the practical application of the steam-engine, or Stephenson by an adaptation which for the first time gave us better communications than the Romans had left us. All the intellectual energies of the race, which slavery had buried too deep for movement, burst into activity when the weight was removed. Thus it has come to pass that England's capital is at once the largest, the richest, the healthiest, the most secure, and the most accessible of all the great capitals which have ever existed in the world.

But there was hope of a higher civilisation through free labour.

Under the Tudors, too, England was to enjoy a government which, if not settled and regular, according to modern ideas, was infinitely more settled than any which had preceded ; and a settled govern-^{Prospect of a more settled government.}ment is the greatest blessing which a nation can enjoy—even though it may not be in the best form which a philosopher could conceive. The Barons had thoroughly exhausted themselves in the Wars of the Roses, and had less strength than at any previous time for making or un-making kings. The causes which gave strength to the Crown gave strength also to the Commons. Commerce began to flourish, towns to increase, and London to extend itself so far that many proclamations were made with the object of stopping its growth. In one sense, therefore, it may fairly be said that modern civilisation began with the reign of Henry VII.

It yet remains, however, to be shown how stubbornly the ancient ignorance and brutality fought against new ideas and strove to maintain their own place in the world. It yet remains to be shown how recent are our greatest improvements in the administration of justice which may, perhaps, be one day still further improved. Many a generation was to pass away before even trial by jury as we now understand it could fully supplant that trial which was known by the same name, but in which the witnesses were the jurors and the jurors the witnesses. Many a generation was to pass away before even persons accused of treason could obtain a fair hearing at the bar of the Lords—many before it ceased to be a crime to hold religious opinions different from the opinions expressed in an Act of Parliament. Men were long afterwards to be burnt for heresy, and women for treason, and great lawyers were yet to profess on the Bench their irrevocably fixed belief in witchcraft.

The resistance of ignorance and brutality still to be stubborn and long.

If the introduction of printing, the prospect of an undisputed succession to the crown, the diminution of villenage, and the attention which was now being directed to commerce and maritime enterprise be excepted, there was little to distinguish the end of the fifteenth century from the middle of the fourteenth. These, indeed, are great exceptions. But corruption still went hand in hand with violence. There was as yet no confidence in any judge or in any officer. Peculation by a chancellor and peculation by a sheriff alike excited complaints, but neither excited surprise. Education by means of printed books was little given and little coveted; the education which is given by public acts of bloodshed was brought home alike to man and to woman, to the aged and the infant. A hasty word was commonly punished by the dagger; a claim, rightful or wrongful, was commonly enforced by a troop of armed men. The gibbet, with a robber hanging in chains, was one of the objects most frequently presented to the eye. A petty thief in the pillory, a scold on the cucking-stool, a murderer drawn to the gallows on a hurdle, were spec-

General
sketch of society at the end of the Middle Ages.

tacles as familiar when Henry VII. ascended the throne, as a messenger from the telegraph office is to ourselves. London Bridge, which is now thronged with travellers peaceably making their way to a railway terminus, was then a narrow thoroughfare, with unglazed shops on either side, with the obstructions of a drawbridge half way across, and perhaps chains at either end. Its chief adornments were the heads of traitors, fixed on poles, as a warning to all who might lack the skill to be on the right side in any future commotions. The fatherless and the widow, if claiming kinship with the king, might sometimes gain possession of the mutilated remains of father or husband, after a few days' exposure to the jeers of the mob. Those who were less fortunate suffered, in addition to their bereavement, the pangs of reflecting that the features which were most dear to them were to be impaled, as an exhibition, during the king's pleasure, which was, in fact, the pleasure of sunshine and storm and natural decay. Nor was London the only city to which was given this impressive caution. The head of a traitor was often sent to the neighbourhood in which the treason had been committed; and there was no town so little favoured as not to receive ever and anon the ghastly present of a quarter, wherewithal to decorate its walls or its gates.

Such, even in their last years, were those middle ages which some teachers would have us believe richer than our own in graces and in virtues. Admiration and loathing are matters of taste; but the facts which have been adduced are, it may be hoped, sufficient to prove that the questions asked in the first page find an answer in the slow march of history. Crime, in its worst forms, is, beyond doubt, an inheritance from past ages ; many, if not all, of the criminals of to-day are the offspring or the imitators, under somewhat different conditions, of more numerous and more brutal criminals who lived in days gone by. The transition of the mediæval state of society into the state of society in which we live will be the subject of another volume.

The transition into the modern state of society remains to be treated.

APPENDIX.

REFERENCES AND NOTES.

A FEW words, in addition to what has been said in the Preface, are, perhaps, needed in explanation not so much of the references and notes themselves as of certain omissions.

It would be a wearisome task to give reasons, which have been given elsewhere, for disregarding the melancholy ravings of a 'Gildas,' the inventions ascribed to an 'Ingulph,' the innumerable silly stories told even by more trustworthy mediæval chroniclers. It is unnecessary to inflict upon the public all the labours of authorship—to write a catalogue of all the evidence which has been rejected, with the reasons for the rejection. It is, as I am only too painfully aware, an act of great pretension to write the word 'History' upon a title-page. But the greater includes the less, and the capacity to form an independent judgment upon the value of different authorities is claimed as soon as the book has received its name. Criticisms upon all the possible sources of a history would occupy a far greater space than the text of the present work. Suffice it to state that no information has been wittingly put aside, except for two reasons—either because the information seemed to be of little importance to the History of Crime after the plan had been drawn out, or because it seemed to be untrustworthy.

As the history is founded throughout upon contemporary evidence, the opinions of modern authors, even upon minor points, have been, as a rule, excluded. There is a great temptation to quote the words of men whose reputation is established beyond cavil, and whom it is impossible not to respect and even to venerate. But, on the other hand, references to books in which materials have been used, as well as to materials themselves, have the great disadvantage of blurring that broad line which ought always to be drawn between first-hand and second-hand information. Nor, indeed, could the mention of great names be of service to the present work, for, so far as I have been able to learn, there is no other history of similar scope. Preceding writers have, therefore, been mentioned only for one of two reasons—either because they have published collections of original materials, or because they have representative names associated with doctrines neither impugned nor accepted in the present history. They have never been cited to prove any point which has been put forward in the text as proved.

The application of the Appendix to the text, it is hoped, will be free from difficulty. For every chapter of the history there is a corresponding chapter of references and explanations. In the side-notes of the Appendix the corresponding pages of the text are indicated. Thus the whole of the sources of each chapter are brought together, and those digressions which it has previously been the custom to throw into an Appendix find their natural place in the Appendix still, but are no longer entirely isolated.

CHAPTER I.

THE short description of prominent criminals in the second paragraph is founded on visits to the dockyard at Portsmouth and to various prisons, as well as on observations made in courts of law. The 'furtive' look of the professional thief will also be found among other characteristics mentioned by an observer of more experience in 'Female Life in Prison, by a Prison Matron.' Vol. i. p. 177.

Pp. 2-3.
Evidence for description of the appearance of various criminals.

The passage in which the Gallic or British sacrifice of criminals is described is founded chiefly on Cæsar 'De Bell. Gall.' lib. vi. c. 16. Cæsar, however, does not there attribute the custom to the British priests, but to the Druids of Gaul; and for that reason the subject is introduced into the text with considerable diffidence. The assertion that human sacrifices of some kind were common in Britain is confirmed by Tacitus ('Annal.' lib. xiv. c. 30). The identity of the customs established by the Druids in Britain and in Gaul is assumed by the Roman writers on the subject—by Cæsar, by Tacitus, and apparently also by Pliny ('Hist. Nat.' xxx. 4). Unless, therefore, all matters preceding the Roman occupation, and during the early part of it, are to be ignored, it is necessary to mention them in the spirit in which they are mentioned by the best authorities. It would, however, have shown excessive credulity to sketch the alleged Druidical form of punishment by fire without a warning that the sketch is warranted only by historical testimony which is not of the highest kind. The Roman writers, though contemporaries, were, perhaps, all dependent on others for their information, and were, in that case, as much narrators at second-hand as though they had lived in the next generation. Still they had, like men who relate events which they have heard from their parents, opportunities of ascertaining the truth second only to those enjoyed by eye-witnesses. To accept all their statements as correct in every particular would be to assume for them an accuracy which they cannot possess; to disbelieve them altogether would be to carry scepticism into obstinate incredulity; to discriminate with precision between the true and the false would be impossible, unless eighteen centuries could be annihilated and the scenes of which the Romans had heard could be

Pp. 10-12.
Evidence of ancient British customs;
estimate of its value.

re-enacted before our eyes. Nothing is left but to admit that the manners of these early times must always remain in some obscurity—that they can be regarded only through the eyes of the foreigner, and that belief and disbelief in any detail are equally dangerous.

The punishments in the amphitheatres have been rendered so familiar not only to classical scholars but to the readers of general history that it

P. 12.
Note on Roman punishments in the arena.

is unnecessary to occupy space or time by reference to authorities in illustration of the subject. It is only necessary to remark that the persistence of these punishments during the whole period of the Roman occupation is proved by innumerable passages in the Theodosian Code, and that its existence in Britain is proved by the remains of the amphitheatres themselves.

For the description of the Roman criminal law in force during the Roman occupation of Britain, the 'Codex Theodosianus' has been

Pp. 13-25.
Note on the use made of the Theodo-sian Code.

followed as the best guide. It was compiled just after the time at which the Romans probably abandoned the island. It could not, therefore, have been introduced into Britain in the form of a code; but it is a compilation founded on earlier imperial laws, many of which were only 'declaratory,' and it necessarily gives, down to the latest date, the general principles according to which Roman 'judices' were expected to administer justice in Britain (as in other provinces) on all points on which the Roman had superseded the native criminal law. The edition of the Code which has been used is that of 'Jacobus Gothofredus,' by J. D. Ritter, in the third volume of which is the ninth book of the Code—'De Criminibus, deque Processu Criminali.' It is to be understood that the 'Tituli' and chapters to which reference is made below are those of the ninth book except where it has been found necessary to mention others.

P. 14.
Law of Laesa Majestas, or High Treason.

The equality of all ranks in the eye of the law, when an accusation of treason was made, and in that case only, is asserted in Tit. 35, 'De Quæstionibus.'

That a slave who made an accusation against his master was to be punished 'gladio' appears by Tit. 6, c. 3; that a slave who was a receiver of thieves was to be burnt, by Tit. 29, c. 2; and that one who committed adultery with a free woman was to be burnt, by Tit. 9; and the punishment of the coinor by Tit. 21, c. 5.

The remarkable punishment of the parricide is the subject of Tit. 15. It is well known that a monkey, as well as the serpent, was at one period sown up in the sack with the offender. Cc. 1 and 2 of Tit. 10, 'Ad Legem Juliam de Vi Publica et Privata,' show that forcible entry on land, Tit. 9 that adultery committed by a free woman with a slave, and Tit. 14, c. 1, that infanticide

References
concerning the use of the more cruel punishments by the Romans.

Pp. 15-16.
Laws showing the gradation of punishments under the Empire.

were capital offences. Sentence to the mines is awarded to violators of sepulchres in Tit. 17, as well as elsewhere to other offenders. 'Deportatio,' or transportation, appears as a penalty under the 'Lex Julia de Ambitu' in Tit. 26, c. 2, and elsewhere. The 'Pistrinum,' or hand-mill, as the 'pœna leviorum criminum,' occurs in Tit. 40, cc. 3, 6, 7, &c. The city of Rome is mentioned in these passages, but the punishment was in all likelihood put in practice elsewhere.

It is hardly necessary to give particular references for the use of torture by the Romans. Abundant instances will be found in Book IX. of the Theodosian Code. The assertion that kings of England could afterwards give a licence to torture is founded on the Pipe Roll, 34 Henry II., Northamptonshire, Ro. 10, where occur the following words :—'Petrus Filius Ade reddit compotum de xxxv. marcis, quia cepit quandam mulierem et eam tormentavit sine licentia Regis.' This, and similar passages, show that the Orders in Council for the application of torture only succeed previous orders issuing from the king.

P. 16, 17.
Evidence concerning the use of torture by Romans and English.

The precautions taken by the Emperor Constantine against the punishment of the innocent, or premature punishment of the guilty, appear in the Cod. Theod. Lib. ix. Tit. 40, c. 1; the ordinance that witnesses must be sworn and that one witness is not sufficient in Lib. xi. Tit. 39, c. 3; the reference to the emperor in doubtful cases in Lib. xi. Tit. 36, c. 1.

Merciful provisions in Roman laws.

According to Lib. ix. Tit. 1, cc. 5, 8, 9, no one could be held 'reus' or put to the torture except after 'inscriptio,' or 'subscriptio,' by the accuser. The infliction of unnecessary hardship upon untried prisoners is forbidden in Tit. 3, c. 1; and the imprisonment of women in the same room with men in c. 3. Tit. 1, c. 7, is 'De audiendis reis intra mensem,' and the purport of c. 18 and of Tit. 3, c. 6, is similar. Tit. 36 gives the provisions 'ut intra annum criminalis actio terminetur.' Tit. 1, c. 19, contains the rule that judges are not to listen to approvers. The date of this is A.D. 423, but it appears in the form of an order for the observance of a law of old standing, and is, as we should now say, declaratory.

P. 17.
Roman laws to secure liberty of the person.

Constantine's letter, 'Ad universos Provinciales,' appears in Tit. 1, c. 4; the rule that even senators should be tried in the province where they were accused in c. 1. In Tit. 28, c. 1, it appears that 'hi judices qui peculatu provincias quassavissent' were guilty of a capital offence; they had, before the year 392, been punished by fine.

P. 18.
Roman laws to protect the Provincials.

The law of Valentinian, that the goods of the convict should go to his children, appears in Tit. 42, c. 6. This was not established without some vacillation (see cc. 1 and 4). There is a provision in the laws known as those of Edward the Confessor (xix.) for the benefit of a criminal's wife, who is to have a share of the husband's goods; and this may be traced back as far as the Laws of Ine (57). See

P. 19.
Laws in favour of the wives and children of criminals.

also the 'Laws of King Æthelstan' V. i. 1. There is little doubt that the clause was inserted by the influence of the clergy, who may have known something of the Roman law.

That it was not in accordance with the feelings of landowners is evident from the Conqueror's Laws (i. 27), which show that the privilege was not enjoyed by the wives of persons subject to the innumerable private jurisdictions of the Pre-Norman times in England. It was in fact wholly inconsistent with the general tenour of the laws or dooms which were introduced when the Teutonic invaders came, and could hardly have been of any avail. (For the influence of the Church in improving the condition of women, see pp. 90-93 of the present volume.) At a later period the wife of a traitor saved her dower, but the first English statute which declares that the jury need no longer enquire what goods and chattels were possessed by a felon is 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 5.

Branding on the forehead those condemned 'In Ludum vel in Metallum,' is prohibited in Cod. Theod. Lib. ix. Tit. 40, c. 2. Tit. 12 is the 'De emendatione Servorum' of Constantine. The 'scævitia immanium barbarorum,' to which he there refers, will be found without difficulty in the 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of England,' passim.

P. 20.
Roman Laws concerning slaves.

The class compared with the feudal villeins is that to which the names 'coloni' and 'tributarii' are given in the Codex Theodosianus.

P. 21.
Evidence of the Theo-dosian Code concerning the owners and cultivators of land.

The term 'adscriptitii,' with which the readers of the earlier English law books are well acquainted, is also sometimes applied to these 'coloni.' Their condition, as described in the text, may be learned from Lib. v. Tit. 9, Tit. 10, and Tit. 11.

The landlords of these 'coloni' in the provinces were originally, it may be inferred, the 'decuriones.' It is in all probability no mere coincidence that in the Roman army there were also 'decuriones,' who were cavalry officers of high rank. The ease with which land could be alienated, or a particular interest in it granted away, and the position of the 'emphyteuta,' who might be called a perpetual lessee, are subjects to which reference is made again and again in the 'Theodosian Code.'

That the 'possessores,' as well as other persons of substance, had to contribute towards the repair of roads and walls is apparent from the Cod. Theod. Lib. xv. Tit. 1, c. 34, and Tit. 3, Lib. xi. Tit. 17, c. 4, and other passages. That they were compelled to serve in the 'Curia' as 'Decuriones,' is made thoroughly manifest in Lib. xii. Tit. 1, 'De Decurionibus,' the 192 chapters of which abound with information concerning these 'curiales.'

P. 22.
Laws concerning the colonial courts.

Curiously enough, too, a letter addressed by the Emperor Constantine 'ad Pacatianum Vicarium Britanniarum' (Lib. xi. Tit. 7, c. 2), not only serves to show that Britain was on the same footing as other parts of the empire, but assists in determining the functions of the 'decuriones' as revenue officers.

^{Proof that these courts existed in Britain.}

The exemption of the 'decuriones,' 'omni corporalis contumeliæ timore,' appears in Lib. xii. Tit. 1, cc. 39, 47, and many other passages. The nomination of wealthy plebeians to fill the office of 'decurio' is enjoined in c. 53; of merchants, provided they were landowners, in c. 72; and of plebeians who were 'agro vel pecunia idonei,' in c. 133.

It is too well known that 'collegia' of certain craftsmen as well as religious 'collegia' existed from a very early period for any reference in proof of the fact to be necessary. The practice of joining a 'collegium' of 'fabri,' or of 'fabricenses,' to avoid service as a 'decurio,' is mentioned in Lib. xii. Tit. 1, cc. 62 and 81. The precise character of these 'collegia,' as of others mentioned in Lib. xiv. Tit. 8, it is not easy to ascertain; it is sufficient to know that they existed, and their existence in Britain is proved by an inscription found at Bath, in which is mentioned a 'Collegium Fabricensium' by two found at Middleby, in which are mentioned 'Collegia Signiferorum,' and by one found at Chichester, in which is mentioned a 'Collegium Fabrorum.' These inscriptions have been printed in the 'Monumenta Historica Britannica,' at pages cxii. cxviii. and cxix. respectively. The 'Collegia Signiferorum' were of a religious character, and may perhaps be identified with the 'Collegia Dendrophororum' mentioned in the Theodosian Code, Lib. xiv. Tit. 8, c. 1. Public works are the subject of Lib. xv. Tit. 1. In chapters 1 and 14 will be found the decrees against removing the ornaments from one city to another.

^{Pp. 23-25. Laws concerning Roman companies or guilds: proof that they existed in Britain.}

The description of a journey in Roman Britain may be justified by the remains of Roman roads still existing, by the list of roads and of towns given in Antonine's 'Itinerary' ('Monumenta Historica Britannica') pp. xx.-xxii., and by the remains of Roman towns and Roman villas which have already been brought to light. It would be tedious to give a list of the Roman villas known to have existed in Britain; but, to show that they did exist in great numbers, reference may be made to descriptions of them in the 'Archæologia,' vol. viii. pp. 363-376; vol. ix. pp. 137-138, and 319-322; vol. xiv. pp. 62-68; and especially to vol. xviii. pp. 112-225 (description of villas in Gloucestershire, with plates of pavements and pillars); pp. 203-221 (description of villa at Bignor, with plates of pavements); vol. xix. pp. 177-178; (further account of villa at Bignor); and pp. 178-183 (villa at Great Witcombe remarkable for the perfection of its baths). The state of the arts in Roman Britain is still better shown by the plates in 'An Account of Roman Antiquities discovered at Woodchester, in the County of Gloucester,' by Samuel Lysons, F.R.S., &c., and by the plates in the 'Reliquiæ Britannico-Romanæ,' published by the same author.

^{Pp. 25-26. Evidence for the description of a journey in Roman Britain.}

It is hardly necessary to adduce proof that Romans travelled in carriages with post horses or mules from the days when Horace said,

P. 25. (Sat. i. v. 86) 'rapimur rhedis' downwards. That, however, the use of horses was, under the empire, permitted only to persons of certain rank is apparent from the Cod. Theod. lib. ix. Tit. 30; 'Quibus equorum usus concessus est aut denegatus.' The provisions were made for Italy, but it may be inferred that they applied a fortiori to remote provinces. The mention of a mint may be justified by the Roman coins, with marks indicating the British towns at which they were struck.

The approach to a Roman villa and its gardens are described from Pliny (Epist. ii. 17, and v. 6)—the villa itself from a comparison, of the remains found at Bignor, Woodchester, &c. (Lysons 'Woodchester,' and the paper in the 'Archæologia' already mentioned), with Pliny's account of his own villas, and with the more perfect remains discovered at Pompeii (see Sir William Gell's 'Pompeiana,' passim). The Bignor, Woodchester, and Witcombe villas alone, however, furnish so many of the details—the fragments of pillars and of pavements, the baths and the hypocausts—that it is unnecessary to travel beyond them, except for explanation. What has been spared in Britain is at least as magnificent as that which corresponds to it at Pompeii. When the pavement and the pillars are known, the frescoes and the gardens can easily be inferred.

An essay on the condition of free Roman women under the empire would be out of place in this work. It must suffice to state, in proof of what is advanced in the text, that their position was by no means unenviable (as compared with that of barbarian women) even in those earlier days when they were under

P. 29. Note on the condition of women under the Empire. 'Tutela' and that the 'Tutela mulierum' itself was no longer an existing institution when the Theodosian Code was compiled. The code shows great tenderness towards the wives even of criminals, and a laudable desire that innocent women should not be impoverished through the crimes of their husbands. The love of the Roman women for dress, and the use made by them of false hair, are well known from the writings of the satirists, and from the representations which remain.

The position of a Roman Governor in Britain, and his establishment, with the cynagium and every other evidence of the Roman organisation, are shown in the 'Notitia.' The part relating to Britain is printed in the 'Monumenta Historica Britannica,' pp. xxiii.-xxiv. The words and thoughts attributed to Pacatian, 'Vicarius Britanniarum' (Vice-gent under the Governor of Gaul) are, it is believed, in accordance with the events and the sentiments of his age (about A.D. 319). After the death of Constantine, the condition of Britain must have been less happy, and the incursions of the barbarians became formidable. Before that time Britain, like the rest of the empire, was agitated by the rival claims of men ambitious of the purple; but it was not till a little later that the quarrels and the brigandage which always follow the disintegration of a military power began to prepare the way for Picts and Teutons.

P. 31.
Note on the position of the Roman Governor in Britain.

The prediction, put into Pacatian's mouth, that an edict forbidding Romans to teach barbarians the art of ship-building would issue too late was verified in the year 419, when those were declared guilty of a capital offence who 'conficiendi naves incognitam ante peritiam Barbaris tradiderunt' (Cod. Theod. Lib. ix. Tit. 40, c. 24). This referred apparently to the Eastern empire. Some of the barbarian dwellers on the shores of the German Ocean seem to have been acquainted with the art of sailing as early as the time of Carausius (towards the end of the third century).

Note (with reference) on imperial edict against teaching barbarians to build ships.

The belief of the Romans in witchcraft is, in its details, so marvelously like the belief of the English as late as the seventeenth century, that it might well form the subject of a narrow-minded essay on the descent of English from Roman customs. To those who have passed years in the study of races, and their origin, the similarity appears simply as a link in the chain of superstition which encircles the earth, and binds together the human beings of all countries. It would, of course, be just as great a proof of ignorance to assume that English superstitions have descended from Roman superstitions exclusively as to assume that every resemblance between an English institution and a Teutonic institution necessarily proves identity of race. The wider the range of investigation the more valueless are such arguments shown to be. To use the language of science, differentiation is in proportion to civilisation; the more uncivilised tribes are, the more they resemble each other in their habits and manners. If an opinion be only ancient, it can be traced to half-a-dozen different sources with equal plausibility; this one in particular is as probably Teutonic as Roman, as probably Roman as Teutonic, and not less probably common to all the earlier inhabitants of the island. But as Rome possessed a literature before Germany possessed a town, it is to Rome that we are indebted for the first minute account of the powers attributed to a witch by any of the more western nations.

Pp. 32-33.
Note on the diffusion of superstitions.

Horace, besides many other mentions of her name, addressed two of his Epodes to Canidia (Epod. 5 and 17. See also Sat. i. 8).

The dread entertained by the Roman veterans of the supernatural power possessed by the Druids, and the omens which preceded the revolt of Boadicea, are mentioned by Tacitus ('Annal.' xiv. 32). Pliny ('Hist. Nat.' xxx. 4) speaks with horror of the extent to which magic was practised in Britain in his time; and there is no doubt that his words convey, if not the truth, at least the common belief in Rome. The punishment of sorcerers by fire, and by the other more cruel punishments, is the subject of Lib. ix. Tit. 16, of the Theodosian Code.

The superstitions of the pagan world, and their effect upon Christianity in the times of Tertullian, Origen, and Eusebius, are so conspicuously brought to notice in the works of those authors, that a selection of particular passages for reference is hardly necessary. For the teaching, however, that the Roman spectacles had their origin in idolatry, which was equivalent to the worship of demons, it will suffice to refer to Tertullian, 'De Spectaculis,' iv. et seq. Origen's belief in charms for putting demons to flight is to be found 'Contra Celsum,' i. 22, iv. 33, 34, &c. His identification of demons with the heathen gods, and his doctrine that they hovered in the air above the earth, that they licked up the blood of sacrifice, and that they could be fettered by the devices of magic, will be found 'Contra Celsum,' v. 46, and vii. 5. In the same work, too (viii. 36), and in the 'De Oracione' (11), is the far more attractive description of Guardian Angels.

Pp. 33-34.
Evidence concerning superstitions, from Horace, Tacitus, Pliny, and the Theodosian Code.

That Christianity, when first introduced into the British islands, contained a mixture of doctrines such as is to be found in the writings of these Early Fathers, may be inferred almost to demonstration. A ceaseless communication between all parts of the Roman empire was kept up by the military system. The British recruits went with their legions where necessity called them; and legions recruited from almost all parts of the known world were stationed in Britain. Every form of religion thus found its way to Britain as to Rome. There is, indeed, a silly fable in Bede's 'Ecclesiastical History' to the effect that Pope Eleutherus sent a successful mission to convert an imaginary British King Lucius. It is but a clumsy plagiarism of the story of Augustine and the King of Kent. Its falseness may be shown by facts which also prove the composite character of the Christianity existing in the British islands before a pope seriously determined to attempt the conversion of our forefathers.

The difference between the Scottish and Roman methods of celebrating Easter, which was brought into prominent notice in the latter half of the seventh century, is described by Bede ('Hist. Eccl.' iii. 25.), who might easily have learnt the particulars. This would have been impossible had Britain accepted its Christianity from Rome in the second century. The pope Eleutherus, who has been named as the contemporary of Lucius, lived many years after the first Paschal controversy; and Anicetus, one of his predecessors, had already argued with Polycarp against the celebration of the Christian festival simultaneously (as sometimes occurred in the Scottish Church) with the Jewish Passover. The observances which the Romish priests anathematised in Britain, centuries after the time of Eleutherus, could not have been derived from Rome; nor, on the other hand, can they be traced exclusively to converted Jews, to any of the Asiatic Churches, or to Alexandria. They appear to have differed in some respects from those of every other Church, and to have been dependent on no particular authority. The various passages in Greek and Latin writings, in which reference is made to Christianity in Britain, have been collected in 'Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain, &c.,' by Messrs. Haddan and Stubbs. They prove, however, only the bare fact that Christianity in some form was known in Roman Britain.

The intermixture of customs disclosed by the Easter controversy in Britain had, without doubt, its counterpart in a similar intermixture of superstitions such as was to be found throughout the Christian world in the third century.

The statement in the text, that we know little or nothing of the superstitions brought by the Teutonic invaders into Britain, may, perhaps, seem strange to the admirers of the Eddas. But this history is written on the principle that only contemporary evidence is to be accepted; and a collection of Scandinavian myths made at the end of the eleventh century, cannot, in any historical sense, throw light on the Teutonic superstitions of the fifth. The poem of 'Beowulf' (edited by Kemble), it is true, supplies here and there a link, but not enough to construct a chain of any strength.

Pp. 37-38.
Note on the statement that it is uncertain what superstitions were introduced by the Teutonic invaders.

The principal evidence of the superstitions existing in England between the time of the conversion of our forefathers to Christianity and the Norman Conquest is to be found in the 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of England,' edited by Mr. Thorpe, and in the 'Saxon Leechdoms,' edited by Mr. Cockayne for the series of Chronicles, &c., published by the Master of the Rolls.

Pp. 38-41.
Evidence of the superstitions in England after the mission of Augustine.

In order to avoid the use of the pre-Norman letters in printing, and at the same time to attain precision, the spelling of proper names which appears in Mr. Thorpe's modern English headings to 'Ancient Laws' has been adopted in references made to that collection. It may seem inconsistent to mention 'Canute' in the text, and to refer elsewhere to the laws of King 'Cnut.' But the reason for referring to the laws of King 'Cnut' is the same as the reason for writing 'Canute' in the text—that every one may understand what is meant. 'Canute' is, in the plain English of the nineteenth century, the name of a Danish king who once ruled in England; the technical description of a certain source of information, as printed in the best edition, is the 'Laws of King Cnut.' A long dissertation on the orthography of the pre-Norman names which occur in the history of England would be out of place, and the subject is of little importance. It seems, however, sufficiently clear that 'Alfred' is to be preferred to 'Ælfred,' 'Edward' to 'Eadweard,' 'Canute' to 'Cnut.' 'Alfred,' 'Edward,' and 'Canute' are names familiar to every one, and are good English, inasmuch as they appear, so written, in the works of classical English historians. 'Ælfred,' 'Eadweard,' and 'Cnut' are forms to be found in MSS. of early date, but the spelling in such MSS. is not uniform. There is good MS. authority for 'Eadward,' as well as for 'Eadweard,' and for 'Eadwerd' as well as for 'Eadward.' Alfred, indeed, was almost always written 'Ælfred' before the Conquest, but before the Conquest 'ecclesia' was almost always written 'æcclesia.' It is therefore as correct and as incorrect to write 'Ælfred' for Alfred as to write 'æcclesiastical' for ecclesiastical. If we are justified in drawing any inference at all concerning the character æ as used in England before the Conquest, we are justified only in drawing the inference that it was equivalent to one value of the Latin e, which was equivalent to the Greek ε. The character æ, as used in modern English type, ordinarily represents, not a short vowel like the Latin e and the Greek ε, but a diphthong compounded of the two letters a and e. If, therefore, the commonly received spelling of Alfred is to be altered, the name should become rather Elfred than Ælfred. Accuracy even in trifles is commendable, and scholarship is a handmaid useful to history; but the substitution of 'Ælfred' for Alfred, of 'Eadweard' for Edward, and of 'Cnut' for Canute is a change which scholars will not unanimously accept as an aid to accurate writing.

Archbishop Theodore's Book of Penance, xxvii., in the 'Ancient Laws, &c.,' shows the belief in the power of human beings to raise storms and commit other iniquities by the aid of demons or false pagan gods. This document (as explained in the Preface to 'Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain, &c.,' edited by Messrs. Haddan and Stubbs) is probably of later origin than that assigned to it; but if so, it only shows more clearly the persistence of superstitions. An ordinance for the expulsion of 'heathendoms' at the end of the tenth or beginning of the eleventh century, will be found in the 'Laws of King

Pp. 38-41.
Evidence of the superstitions in England after the mission of Augustine.

(Continued.)

Ethelred,' v. 1. Still later, 'heathenship' is defined, in the Secular 'Laws of King Cnut,' 5, as the worship of heathen gods such as the sun, moon, wells, stones, and trees. After the evidence from the early Christian Fathers, it is hardly necessary to adduce any further arguments in support of the proposition that these superstitions are in no way distinctively Teutonic. The passage in Tac. 'Germ.' 16, in which it is stated that the Germans live where a spring, or a grove, or pasture may invite them, refers obviously to the facilities for getting such necessities as water, wood, and fire; and there is nothing in the context to suggest any other interpretation. Had superstition been studied as a common affection of humanity, the words would never have been perverted (as they often have) to establish a theory that every custom and every institution can be traced exclusively to one particular race. A fair case might indeed be made out for the derivation of all later superstitions from those existing in Britain during the Roman period, but this would be a narrow and unphilosophical view. That they would all have existed, had there been no Low German invasion, is certain; that many of them would have existed had no race preceded the Teutonic, is probable. Any argument from such materials in proof of descent must therefore be a waste both of time and of ingenuity.

To return, however, to the evidence of the superstitions existing in England before the Norman Conquest, the 'Liber Pœnitentialis Theodori' and the 'Pœnitentiale Ecgberti' abound with illustrations none the less valuable if, as Messrs. Haddan and Stubbs maintain, the so-called 'Penitential' of Egbert is, like that attributed to Theodore, of later date than has been assigned to it. Penances for the practice of magic by priests are to be found in the 'Lib. Pœn. Theod.,' xxvii. 8, 10, and in the 'Pœnit. Ecgb.,' iv. 18. Witchcraft practised by women is mentioned in both those treatises, and in some of the secular laws; but the belief in the power of witches to kill their victims appears most plainly in the 'Confessionale Ecgberti,' 29.

The belief that persons suffering from mental derangement were possessed by devils appears in numerous passages in the 'Saxon Leechdoms,' and especially in vol. ii. pp. 352, 354, 356, where charmed remedies for the expulsion of the intruders are carefully described. Christian charms for finding what has been lost, and other purposes, are to be found in the same collection, vol. i. p. 392, vol. iii. p. 288, &c. The use of the 'Pater Noster' and 'Credo' as charms, is distinctly recommended also in the 'Pœnitentiale Ecgberti,' ii. 23.

The custom of accepting cattle and sheep as a satisfaction for a human life is attributed to the ancient Germans by Tacitus ('Germania,' 21). There is not the slightest reason to doubt his statement, as it is confirmed by the subsequent laws of the Germans in all the provinces of the Roman empire which they overran. When they became acquainted with money, they received it, instead of live stock, as compensation, but in other respects the custom remained unchanged. The practice could not, like many others, have been adopted by them from the Romans, who had at least advanced far beyond that stage of barbarism.

P. 41.
Evidence of ancient German manners and customs.

The other details of German manners (given at the same page) are from the 'Germania,' cc. 5, 12, 22, carefully compared with the passage in Cæsar, 'Bell. Gall.,' vi. 22-23, which seems to be founded on very accurate information, and clearly indicates that the writer had knowledge of the Teutonic tribe within its Mark.

The assertion in the text that the family feud and the system of composition for murder are common to various tribes, and in no way exclusively characteristic of the speakers of Teutonic or even of Aryan languages, may be easily proved. There are numerous passages in the 'Iliad' and elsewhere which show what was the practice in the Homeric age, and perhaps considerably later. The scene delineated on the shield of Hephæstus is, perhaps, as good an illustration of manners and customs as could be desired, and occurs in 'Iliad,' xviii. 498. Should further confirmation be required, it is to be found in 'Iliad,' v. 266, xiii. 659, xiv. 483, &c. In the Welsh Laws of Hoel Dda payments for murder are as fully recognised as even in the Teutonic laws. See 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales' (Record Com.) passim. In them the Welsh word 'galanas' is seen to be exactly equivalent to 'murdrum,' i.e. to represent both the deed and the fine for it. The claim of the kindred is also everywhere recognised. The 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of Ireland—Senchus Mor' (published under the direction of the Commissioners for publishing the 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of Ireland') show also the existence in Ireland of the institution of the fine for murder, and the liability of the kindred. See vol. i. pp. 185, 189, 259, 273; and vol. ii. p. 285. The blood-feud among the Jews is mentioned in Numb. xxxv. 21, Deut. xix. 6, Josh. xx. 5, &c. The custom of setting a price upon a human life is intimately connected with the recognition of slavery, which, as is well known, is almost universal among barbarous and semi-barbarous tribes. According to Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, it survived in Turkey in the eighteenth century with some customs nearly related to slavery, and, perhaps, survives there still. 'Murder,' she says, 'is never pursued by the king's officers, as with us. 'Tis the business of the next relations to revenge the dead person; and if they like better to compound the matter for money (as they generally do), there is no more said of it.' ('Letters and Works of Lady M. W. Montagu,' edited by Moy Thomas, vol. i. p. 363.)

Pp. 42-43.
Evidence that the blood-feud was common to various races.

The introduction of composition for murder by the Teutonic tribes in countries in which they adopted the Roman law, or permitted it to exist, is well illustrated by documents in Savigny's 'Geschichte des römischen Rechts im Mittelalter,' vol. ii. pp. 13-19 (Heidelberg edition).

Pp. 44-46.
Evidence that it was continued by Teutonic Conquest.

The existence of the custom in England before the Norman Conquest is so well known, and is established by such abundant evidence, that it is only necessary to refer to the 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of England' passim.

The statement in the text that Britain is lost or nearly lost to history from the end of the Roman period to the end of the seventh century, may excite surprise in those who have not criticised the writings of the intervening period which have been called historical. I have in another work given my reasons for distrusting the evidence to be found in any of them. The laws, some of which may be of the earlier part of the seventh century, are, of course, most valuable as far as they go.

P. 46.
Note on the first appearance of England in history.

The commutation of penances is illustrated in the 'Ecclesiastical Institutes,' which constitute the latter portion of the 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of England'—in the 'Liber Pœnitentialis' and in the 'Capitula' which are there attributed to Archbishop Theodore, and in the similar compilations of later times. Further light is thrown on the subject in Cockayne's 'Saxon Leechdoms,' vol. iii. p. 166.

Pp. 47-48.
Note on the commutation of penances.

The distinction between the freeman and the slave in the enjoyment of facilities for religious observances appears in many of the 'Ancient Laws,' &c., but is most clearly shown in the 'Laws of King Alfred,' xliii., in which are mentioned the holidays enjoyed by freemen, but denied to slaves.

Pp. 48-49.
Laws showing the distinction between freemen and slaves
in England.

In all the 'Ancient Laws,' &c., it is apparent that the punishment of mutilation was, as a rule, inflicted only on the churl and the slave. As might have been expected, the punishments vary somewhat in various reigns, but show no progress towards humanity. The most severe are to be found in the 'Laws of King Alfred,' the 'Laws of King Æthelstan,' the 'Laws of King Cnut,' and the 'Leges Regis Henrici Primi.' It is in the last collection that flaying ('excoriatio') is mentioned as a punishment (lxxv. 1), but there is some doubt about the reading. The exact date of these laws and their sources are uncertain, but it is probable that they were compiled after the reign of Henry I., certainly not before it; and they exhibit all the ferocity of the earlier laws in existence before the Norman Conquest. By most of the laws compensation was permitted in the case of theft, but in the 'Laws of King Æthelstan'

Pp. 49-51.
Laws concerning the punishment of slaves and freemen in England.

death was the penalty both for freeman and for serf. In them (iii. 6) are found the brutal punishment for free women, the stoning of the male serf, and the burning of the female by other females. The summary infliction of death on thieves detected in the act appears in the 'Laws of King Wihtræd,' 25-26; in the 'Laws of King Æthelstan,' i. 1, &c.

The ordeals by water and hot iron are frequently mentioned in the various 'Ancient Laws and Institutes.' The description, given in the

Pp. 52-55.
Laws concerning the Ordeal.

text, of the mode of proceeding is from the 'Laws of King Æthelstan,' iv. 7. The 'corsnæd,' by which the monks cleared themselves, appears in the 'Laws of King Ethelred,' ix. 22, 24, and in the 'Laws of King Cnut,' Ecclesiastical, 5. The origin of this test may, perhaps, be traced to the well-known effect of fear, or other strong emotion in paralysing the salivary glands, and so checking deglutition. In the last-named law is mentioned also the purgation by simple oath on the 'housel.'

Compurgation, as applied to the clergy, is, to a certain extent, explained in the same place, and, as applied to the laity, in the 'Laws

Pp. 55-57.
References concerning Compurgation and its relation to trial by Jury.

of King Ethelred,' i. 1, and the 'Laws of King Cnut,' Secular, 30. The matter, however, is somewhat obscure. The form of oath is, in the 'Ancient Laws and Institutes,' among the 'Oaths' of which the date is uncertain. First of all the accused swears (5) 'By the Lord, I am guiltless, both in deed and counsel, of the charge of which N. accuses me.' Then each compurgator swears (6) 'By the Lord, the oath is clean and unperjured which N. has sworn.' In the latter case 'N.' stands, of course, for the accused. The functions of the early jury, compared in the text with those of the compurgators, are best ascertained from a study of the 'Rotuli Curiae Regis,' which begin in the reign of Richard I., and of which the earliest have been edited by Sir Francis Palgrave, and published by the Record Commission. The history of juries is, however, further discussed in Chapter II., etc.

The view propounded in the text that the guild and the peace-union, or peace-pledge, were but different developments of the same institution,

Pp. 57-58.
Laws concerning the Guild as a part of the Police system.

is not, perhaps, precisely that of any other author. It seems, however, to be consistent with the evidence, and is in harmony with contemporaneous and later events. The guild is first mentioned by that name in the 'Laws of King Ine,' 16, in which it might be supposed to be the social or voluntary guild, but that the laws among which reference is made to it are of a public character. The original is not less obscure than the English translation which follows:—'He who slays a thief must declare on oath that he slew him offending; not his guild-brethren.' It might even refer to the practice of swearing together, which was not to be enforced when there was only a question of killing a thief. From this passage alone, however, which is so vaguely worded, it would be unsafe to infer much. But the word 'gegildan,' correctly, perhaps, translated 'guild-brethren' in the instance in which it occurs in the 'Laws of King Ine,' has most undoubtedly that signification in the 'Laws of King Alfred,' 27, 28 :—'Of kinless men.—If a man, kinless on the paternal side, fight and slay a man, let the maternal relatives, if he have any, pay a third of the "wer," his guild-brethren a third, and for a third let him flee. If he have no maternal relatives, let his guild-brethren pay half, and for half let him flee. If a kinless man be slain, let half the "wer" be paid to the king, half to the guild-brethren.'

In these laws it is quite clear that the 'gegildan' have a responsibility similar to that of the tithing or hundred in later times, and that they also have a privilege of receiving compensation similar to the privilege of the family. It is not difficult to perceive here the identity, in origin, of the social or voluntary with the political or compulsory guild.

Among the 'Laws of King Edgar' is an 'ordinance how the hundred shall be held,' in which the tithing is mentioned by name. It is quite evident that the members of the tithing and the hundred mentioned in this instrument, have precisely the same responsibilities and advantages as the 'gegildan' mentioned in the earlier laws, and are, in fact, so far as the commonwealth is concerned, the same body under another name.

Pp. 58-60.
References
concerning the Guild, the Tithing, the Hundred, and the Manor.

In the same collection (ii.) it is ordained that every man shall have a 'borh' responsible for him. The 'frið-borh' (peace-pledge), however, can historically be identified with the frank-pledge of Norman times, which again can be identified with the 'decenna,' 'dozein,' or tithing. It is therefore not too much to assert that the guild is the foundation of the whole system of police which prevailed before the Conquest. This view seems, too, to be confirmed by the 'Laws of King Æthelstan,' v. —'Judicia Civitatis Lundoniæ.'

The remarks in the text upon the relations of the hundred and the manor to the tithing are founded upon the ordinance in the 'Laws of King Edgar' concerning the holding of the hundred, and upon the similar passage in the laws attributed to Henry I. (vii. and viii.), compared with the 'Rotuli Hundredorum,' and the 'Placita de Quo Warranto' (passim) as published by the Record Commission, and with innumerable unpublished records in which the 'visus franci plegii' is mentioned as belonging to a manor. Nothing, perhaps, more clearly shows the practical identity of the Hundred Court with the Court of the Manor in some matters than a passage in the Inquest of Sheriffs, A.D. 1170 (printed in Stubbs' Select Charters from the MS. Bodl. Rawlinson, 641). Mention is there made of those who hold the 'Hundreds of the Barons.' The expression refers to Hundred-Courts, the profits of which are held by Barons from the king, either 'ad firmam,' or 'in custodia.' The Court of the Manor, in one of its aspects, was, as is well known, called 'Court Baron.'

The care with which the Danes were anxious to enforce the Law of Peace-Pledge appears in the 'Laws of King Cnut,' Secular, 20.

Instances of voluntary guilds existing before the Norman Conquest will be found in Hicckes' 'Thesaurus Antiq.' Sept., vol. i., Dissertatio

Pp. 61-62. Epistolaris. See also Kemble's 'Codex Diplomaticus,' Evidence concern- No. 942. A translation of the rules of these pre-Norman ing voluntary guilds is given in Mr. Kemble's 'Saxons in England,' vol. i.,

Appendix D.

The Massacre of the Danes is recorded in the 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle,' anno 1002; and in the same year there is a good example of the assassination of magnate by magnate, and of the manner in which the deed was regarded.

The existence of guilds of burgesses in towns in England before the Norman Conquest is shown by Domesday Book (as photozincography),

Pp. 64-65. Kent, p. i, 'In Dove're . . . erat Gihalla Burgensium,' Evidence of Domesday concerning guilds of burgesses. and p. iii., 'In Civitate Cantuaria . . . burgenses habebant de rege xxxiii acras terre in gildam suam.' The remark in the text concerning gold-workers in England is founded not only on some passages in the Chronicles, but on the more trustworthy evidence in Domesday, where the mention of them is so frequent as hardly to require a particular reference.

The facts given in the text respecting the names of towns will not be disputed, and require but little further comment. The names prevailing

Pp. 66-72. before the Conquest (the 'ceasters,' etc.) will be found in the Note on the names and origin of towns and shires. 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle,' or in the works of Bede, passim. Modern chesters (including the forms caster, caistor, etc.)

to the number stated in the text, or beyond, may be found by a study of the Population Abstracts, or of any work which gives the names of places with some minuteness. The Roman 'colonia' of Lindum gave its name not only to Lincolnshire, but, perhaps, at an earlier time to Lindsey, as a portion of that county was once called. It is only necessary to add that the identification of 'York' with 'Eburacum,' which may seem rather forced, is not a conjecture, but can be established through successive stages. Eburacum becomes in the language of the Teutonic conquerors Eoforwic, both the b in one case and the f in the other being equivalent to our v. The f, as in Leofwine (Lewin), and innumerable other instances, is, in pronunciation, softened into w. Eoworic is then plainly enough no other than York. The most enthusiastic advocate for the continuance of the Roman towns is Mr. Coote, in his

'Neglected Fact' in English History ; the most enthusiastic on the other side is Mr. Kemble, in the chapter and appendix on towns in 'The Saxons in England.'

The remarks at p. 71 of the text do not require the support of authority in this place. The facts on which they are founded are obvious to every one ; and where a city has a tradition concerning its foundation, the robber or the soldier (whichever title may be preferred) always plays a part in it.

The derivation of the name of the shire from the name of the town, in the majority of instances requires no further proof than a reference to any map of England.

The ancient German mode of life in huts, but not in towns, is described by Tacitus ('Germania,' 12, 15, 16, 21, 22, etc.). No details have been introduced into the text for which there is not his authority.

P. 73.
Evidence of the ancient German mode
of life.

Ignorance of the use of coin among those Germans who were at a distance from the Roman frontier is shown in Tac. 'Germ.' 5. Though the amount of the 'wer' was commonly estimated in money in England, it is evident that the Teutonic conquerors brought the primitive custom of barter with them, for it is provided, even in the 'Laws of the Conqueror' (i. 9), that the 'wer' may, if preferred, be paid in the shape of horses or bulls.

Pp. 74-75.
Evidence concerning the early use of coin.

It appears by the 'Laws of King Æthelstan,' i. 14, that there were in his time moneyers in all the chief towns—more or less according to the magnitude of the place.

The trinoda necessitas of the allodial tenure is so familiar to all students of history that there is no need to give authorities in proof of its existence in England or elsewhere.

P. 75.
Notes on the use of roads and walls by the Teutonic settlers.

The adoption of the Roman roads with the Roman term for a paved way, 'strata,' is known to every one who has heard of Watling Street, Ermin Street and Icknield Street. There is, perhaps, no greater testimony to the permanence of Roman influence throughout Europe than is to be found in the word 'Street,' appearing at every corner of every town in England, and in the word 'Strasse,' which has travelled with Roman arts to parts of Germany which were inaccessible to Roman arms.

The pages upon the early tenure of land, and its modification by the position of the towns, were written after the consideration of a vast mass of evidence. The ancient German custom is established by Tac. 'Germ.' 26, which passage represents the Germans as being but little advanced beyond the point they had attained in the time of Cæsar. See 'Bell. Gall.' vi. 22.

Pp. 76-80.
Note and evidence concerning Teutonic and primitive land-tenure, and the early tenure of land
in England.

The partition of the Promised Land among the Israelites by tribes will be familiar to every one. The agrarian disputes and laws of the Roman Republic show the existence in Italy of land analogous to 'folc-land.' The illustration from modern Indian villages, in which Aryan dialects are spoken, is from Sir Henry Maine's 'Village Communities in the East and West.' The work contains information from the far East which is of great assistance in the investigation of the early tenure of land. See especially Lect. iv. It is after consideration of the information given in these books, of the dissertation upon the Teutonic Mark in Mr. Kemble's 'Saxons in England,' of the explanation of folc-land and boc-land in Mr. Allen's 'Inquiry into the Rise and Growth of the Royal Prerogative in England' (pp. 125-155, edition of 1849), and of certain facts which must be obvious to every one, that the statements in the text are put forward. The view taken is not precisely that of any one of the authors mentioned, but it may be hoped that it is not inconsistent with the evidence adduced by them or found elsewhere.

The word Mark (mearc), in the sense of land-mark or border, occurs frequently enough in the early laws and charters, and is familiar to every one as the Marches and as Mercia. As the boundary not of kingdoms in the modern sense, but of smaller territories, it occurs in many of the documents printed in Mr. Kemble's 'Codex Diplomaticus,' in the 'Laws of Hlothhære and Eadric,' 15, and in the 'Laws of King Wihtræd,' 8. That its original meaning was simply a border may be inferred from the cognate Latin word 'margo.'

The private jurisdiction of the land-holder was commonly known, after the Norman Conquest, as 'sac, soc, tol, team, and infangentheof,' all of which may have belonged to the tribe within the Mark. The 'fossa' and 'furca' are commonly mentioned among the appurtenances of manors, and were obviously necessary adjuncts to 'infangentheof,' or the right of judging thieves caught on the manor. The fact that possession by a lord had superseded the more primitive mode of tenure long before the Conquest is abundantly evident in the early laws. It will suffice to mention the 'Laws of King Æthelstan,' i. 2, in which it is provided that any man who has no lord may be slain as a thief. The instances of private jurisdictions enjoyed by land-holders are so numerous in Domesday Book that to cite a few particular passages would be to weaken the proof.

The private jurisdictions in towns, before the Conquest, are almost as conspicuous in Domesday as those which were enjoyed without the walls. The 'xii lagemanni' of Lincoln, however, some of whom were succeeded by their sons, in the interval between the death of Edward the Confessor and the compilation of the Great Survey, were, like those of

P. 77.
Note and evidence concerning the 'Mark.'

P. 82.
Note on private jurisdictions in the country.

P. 83.
Evidence of Domesday, &c., concerning private jurisdictions in towns.

Stamford, on a somewhat different footing from some magnates who enjoyed 'sac' and 'soc' elsewhere. They resembled the twelve senior or superior thanes of the wapentake (whose functions, as will hereafter be seen, merged in those of the Grand Jury), and the 'xii iudices' of the city of Chester, who seem to have enjoyed their privileges as a body rather than as private individuals. See Domesday Book, as photozincographed (for Lincoln, and Stamford), 'Lincolnshire,' pp. i. and ii., and (for Chester), 'Cheshire and Lancashire,' p. i. But for the exercise of private jurisdictions in towns by individuals in their private capacity, see (with respect to Norwich) 'Norfolk,' p. xv., where it appears that Stigand had sac and soc over 50 burgesses, and Harold over 32; see (with respect to Canterbury) 'Kent,' p. iii., where are mentioned five private jurisdictions; see (with respect to Huntingdon), 'Huntingdonshire,' p. i, where are mentioned four private jurisdictions; and see (with respect to Hereford), 'Herefordshire,' p. i., where it appears that the moneyers of the city had their own sac and soc. It must be understood that these cases are not cited as a catalogue, but merely as specimens. The manner in which these powers were exercised in the towns was probably not very different from that of their exercise elsewhere. The curious jurisdiction at one time attached to Baynard's Castle is described in the 'Liber Custumarum,' part i. 149-151, ed. Riley, as well as in the 'Memorials of London,' published by the Corporation under the same editorship. Its first origin must, of course, be matter of conjecture.

The extent of the jurisdiction possessed by towns in their municipal capacity is only a matter of inference. The 'burh-gemot' was to meet three times a year according to the 'Laws of King Edgar,' ii. 5, and the 'Laws of King Cnut,' Secular, 18, but the manner of its meeting cannot be ascertained. In some towns the reeve ('port-gercfa') may have been in no higher position than that of the steward of a manor; and this condition may, perhaps, be described by the expression 'in dominio.' London, as is sufficiently apparent from the charter of the Conqueror confirming its privileges, was not 'in dominio'; of the other towns it appears from Domesday that some were and some were not 'in dominio.' The condition of towns, is, however, further discussed at the beginning of Chapter III. It may suffice, for the present, to suggest that in lawless times lords attempted to gain complete mastery over towns, and towns took advantage of such circumstances as might favour them to recover or increase their liberties. Sometimes, too, the king may have granted his real or supposed rights of jurisdiction to a lord, either lay or ecclesiastical, as a mark of favour or with the object of raising money.

The constitution of the various kinds of 'Gemot,' or court, before the Conquest, is very obscure. In the 'Laws of King Edgar,' ii. 5, and in the 'Laws of King Cnut,' Secular, 18, it is provided that the Shire-moot is to meet twice a year under the bishop and the ealdorman. The

Pp. 83-84.
Note on municipal jurisdictions.

Pp. 84-85.
Note on the moots or courts in existence before the Conquest, and on the proceedings in them.

Hundred-moot, it appears by the 'Laws of King Edward,' 11, compared with the 'Laws of King Edgar,' concerning the Hundred, 1, met once in every four weeks under its reeve. It probably presented the more important cases to the superior shire-moot, and in this sense performed some of the functions of the grand jury. The existence of a supreme court—apparently only of appeal—over which the king presided, may be inferred from the 'Laws of King Æthelstan,' i. 3, the 'Laws of King Edgar,' ii. 2, and the 'Laws of King Cnut,' Secular, 17. On this subject there are many controverted points, but it is hardly worthy of discussion for the purposes of the present work.

What may have been the judicial preliminaries to compurgation and ordeal it is impossible to determine with precision, but the excessively rude, not to say ludicrous, character of the proceedings in disputes concerning land is illustrated by a document published in Hicke's 'Thesaurus Ant. Sept.,' vol. i., 'Dissertatio Epistolaris,' pp. 2-3; and mentioned by Mr. Kemble in the introduction to his 'Codex Diplomaticus,' p. cix. A son sued his mother for certain lands; three thanes left the court and went five miles to enquire of her concerning the facts. She fell into a great passion, and declared that she had no lands belonging to her son, and that he should have none belonging to her. She then expressed a wish that after her death all her goods and lands should be given to a female friend of hers, and requested the thanes to make this known in the Shire-moot. So they rode back and told their story; and the husband of the lady in whose favour this strange kind of will was made rode off to a church and had it entered in a book there.

The sketch of society previous to the Norman Conquest is founded on the various documents printed in the 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of England.' It is there made clearly manifest that the same spirit of ferocity pervaded all the laws—down even to the time of that compilation from earlier sources which is attributed to Henry I., and which might be styled the 'Laws of Edward the Confessor' with as much or as little propriety as the laws commonly so called. The Laws of Edward the Confessor, for which a clamour was raised after the Conquest, were only the customs in use before the coming of the Conqueror—not a code of any particular date. This is one of many cases in which a reference to evidence taken as a whole, and in accordance with the general spirit, is better than a reference to a particular letter selected here and there. An allusion has been made to Asser, the biographer of Alfred, who may have been Alfred's friend and companion, and whose work may really have descended to us.

Pp. 86-88.
Note on the general character of the pre-Norman Laws,
&c.

No one, however, who is conversant with the history of manuscripts would unhesitatingly accept the Life of Alfred attributed to Asser as an unquestionable authority. It is unfortunate that the only early MSS. of this biography which are said to have existed have perished or disappeared. The genuineness of the work is of no great importance to this history, and great labour would be required to settle the point. The general character of Alfred, so far as the statements in the text are concerned, is established by his Laws and by the 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.' The same Chronicle and the 'Laws of King Cnut' suggested the remarks upon Canute; the same Chronicle and the contemporary Lives published in the 'M.R.' series, the remarks upon Edward the Confessor.

The description of life attributed by Bede to the pagan chieftain just before conversion is in the 'Hist. Eccl.' ii. 13. This must be accepted as a picture of rural manners at least as late as Bede's time; and it seems fair to assume that if the laws did not become less brutal during the three following centuries the general mode of life could have been but little improved.

P. 87.
Note on the persistence of the same general conditions
of life.

The monasteries, as they grew wealthier, no doubt made some progress in architecture; new churches were built in the towns, and the successful merchant might possibly arrive at the rank of thane (see 'Ancient Laws, &c., of England,' Ranks, 6). But later history shows how little progress had been made before the Norman Conquest.

The position of the 'wite-þeow,' or insolvent criminal reduced to slavery, and therefore capable of stealing his own body, is described in the 'Laws of King Ine,' 24. See also the 'Laws of King Æthelstan,' Proœmium. The custom of the ancient Germans to stake liberty at games of chance is described in Tac. 'Germ.' 24. The 'Ancient Laws and Institutes' abound with passages in which the sale of a Christian slave into a heathen country is forbidden; but sale into a Christian country is not forbidden. William the Conqueror forbade sale into any foreign land ('Leg. Will. Conq.' iii. 15), and from this we may infer that the practice was still common in his time. William of Malmesbury indeed ('Anglia Sacra,' ii. 258) speaks of the export of great numbers of slaves, but though he lived not very long afterwards, he did not relate what was within his own knowledge. The evidence of the Laws is far more trustworthy, and is sufficient to establish the fact.

Pp. 89-90.
Note on slavery in England.

The practice of buying a bride with cattle or money is regulated in the 'Laws of King Æthelbirht,' 77-78, &c., and in the 'Laws of King Ine,' 31. In the event of the person sold becoming a widow, half the sum given for her seems to have been set apart for her support, provided the husband did not die without issue; the other half seems to have become absolutely the property

Pp. 90-91.
Note and evidence concerning the practice of wife-buying.

of the seller. Marriage settlements and dower may have been developed out of these primitive arrangements, but it is impossible to explain them away as not being in themselves a process of bargain and sale. If there could be a doubt on the subject, the provision in the 'Laws of King Æthelbirht,' 31, would set it at rest. The obligation of the adulterer to buy a new wife and deliver her to the injured husband is the best commentary on the nature of the nuptial contract.

The incidental remarks upon the preaching and practice of the clergy are founded upon a comparison one with another of the instruments described as 'Monumenta Ecclesiastica,' in the 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of England.' No statement has been made for which there is not ample evidence; but the general correctness of the sketch given in the text can be estimated better by a study of the documents in general, than by verification of a few references to particular passages.

The ward on the highways is described in the 'Laws of the Conqueror,' i. 28. It may have existed before the Conquest, but it is not mentioned in any of the earlier laws, and the point must, therefore, necessarily remain in doubt. The responsibility of a host for his guest after two or three days' sojourn is mentioned in the 'Laws of Hlothhære and Eadric,' 15; 'Cnut,' Sec. 28; 'Will. Conq.' i. 48, and 'Ed. Conf.' 23.

Lanfranc's abhorrence of the manners and customs of his flock will be found in 'Lanfranci Opera,' vol. i. pp. 19-21, Letter No. 3, ed. Giles. 'The conquered, too, hardly spoke more highly of themselves than the conquerors spoke of them. See the contemporary 'Life of Edward the Confessor,' edited by Mr. Luard for the M.R. series, p. 432.

Pp. 92-94.
Note on the character of the clergy.

P. 94.
Note on Watch and Ward, &c.

Pp. 94-95.
Reference to Lanfranc's description of England, with evidence in confirmation.

CHAPTER II.

THE word 'Englishry' has been used in the text at p. 96 and elsewhere to denote collectively the native subjects of the victorious Normans. It is formed after the analogy of the 'Jewry,' the 'Irishry,' the 'chivalry,' the 'Jacquerie,' &c., and is appropriate as being French in form. In the 'Presentment of Englishry,' the word is used in a different sense—meaning the condition of a person born of English parents.

P. 96.
Note on the use of the word
'Englishry' in the text.

The statement that God handed over the inhabitants of England to be exterminated by the conquering Normans will be found in 'Henr. Huntingd.' lib. vi. (Scriptores post Bedam, p. 367). It is a repetition (mutatis mutandis) of the statement in 'Gildas,' that the Britons were exterminated by the invaders from Northern Germany.

P. 96.
Reference to Henry of Huntingdon
concerning the Norman Conquest.

The adoption of the principle which made the hundred responsible for the murders committed within its limits, and the restriction of the responsibility to cases of murder in which the English were not the sufferers, are shown not only by the Laws attributed to the Conqueror, i. 22, and the Laws of Henry I. i. cxi., but also by the Rotuli Curiae Regis of a later date (Ric. I., &c.). The diminution in the number of acts of violence and robberies, under the rigorous rule of the Conqueror, is mentioned in the compilation commonly called the 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle,' anno 1087. It is there mentioned that a traveller might preserve his money on his journey, if a man of sufficient courage and strength.

P. 98.
Evidence concerning the law of Murder immediately after the Conquest.

The letter of Lanfranc, quoted in illustration of the actual condition of society at this time, is No. 32 in Giles's edition, p. 51. The appointment of Robert de Limesey, to whom it is addressed, as Bishop of Chester, is mentioned in the 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle,' and in 'Florence of Worcester,' anno 1085-1086; the removal by him of the see from Chester to Coventry, in 'Florence of Worcester,' anno 1102, and his death at Coventry, also in 'Florence of Worcester,' anno 1117.

Pp. 98-99.
References
concerning the sack of a Monastery by a Bishop.

The letter in which Gregory VII. mentions the custom of buying and selling wives 'in insula Anglorum,' is in Giles's edition of Lanfranc's Letters, vol. i. p. 59, Letter No. 40.

Pp. 99-100.
Reference to the letter of Gregory VII.
on wife-selling.

The mutilation of criminals as a perpetual warning to the ill-disposed is recommended in the 'Leges. W. Conq.' iii. 17; the disapprobation of the synod held in London will be found in Giles's 'Op. Lanf.' i. 307, as well as in Wilkins' 'Concilia,' i. 363-364.

It has been suggested that the trial by combat was recognised in England before the Conquest because it was common to the Northern nations. Not only, however, is there the negative evidence of its absence from the laws which constitute our only sources of information, but there is the positive evidence of later charters, which clearly show that the native townsmen at least were not familiar with the practice, and considered it a privilege to be excused from the necessity of fighting to prove their innocence. See (passim) the Charters to towns in the 'Rotuli Chartarum.' This instance shows the extreme danger of inferring the existence of any customs in England solely from their existence among 'Teutonic' nations elsewhere.

The character of Lanfranc given in the text is founded generally upon the acts of his life and his writings. References to particular passages apart from their context would in this, as in many other cases, be worse than useless. Lanfranc's horror of clerical marriages, and the story of the married Bishop of Lichfield, are to be found in Giles's edition of Lanfranc's works, vol. i. p. 22, Letter No. 4.

The alleged introduction of feudal principles into England at the time of the Conquest is very briefly touched in the text, because a long disquisition upon the subject would obviously be out of harmony with the objects of the present work. Those elements in the tenure of land which had a tendency to produce crime have, it may be hoped, been sufficiently indicated in the first chapter; and the continuance of the same elements is made apparent in those portions of the history for which materials are more abundant, as, for instance, the portion relating to the reign of Edward III. It should, however, be mentioned that the general spirit of the laws collected in the 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of England' is to draw a clear distinction between the man who is a Hlaford or lord, and the man who has a lord over him. Military service was an incident of allodial no less than of feudal tenure; and the reliefs, aids, &c., which were considered the most oppressive parts of the Norman rule, were excrescences which should not be confounded with the feudal system itself. It is tolerably obvious, therefore, that the dispute concerning the first introduction of feudalism into England is a dispute about words rather than facts.

P. 100.
Reference concerning mutilation under the Conqueror.

P. 100.
Note on the introduction of trial by combat.

Pp. 100-102.
Note on the character of Lanfranc.

Pp. 102-103.
Note on the introduction of feudalism into England.

The encroachments of Gregory VII., and the manner in which they were met by William, appear in Lanfranc's Letters, 10 and 11, Giles, vol. i. p. 31 et seq.

Pp. 104-105.
Reference concerning Gregory's encroachments.

The separation of the ecclesiastical from the secular jurisdiction is the subject of one of William's charters. 'Ancient Laws, &c., of England,' Leges Will. Con. iv.

The law separating ecclesiastical from secular jurisdiction.

Domesday Book may now be very conveniently studied in the photozincographs of it published, county by county, under the direction of the Master of the Rolls. They are fac-similes, and to consult them is equivalent to consulting the Book itself. For that reason reference has been made to them in this work, rather than to the old edition. A 'Great Roll,' as each of the great Exchequer rolls is usually styled in the document itself, is, perhaps, better known as a Pipe Roll, or Great Roll of the Pipe. The first of these most valuable records was published by the Record Commission, under the editorship of Mr. Joseph Hunter, who succeeded in fixing its date—the 31st year of Henry I.—by a very exhaustive process of reasoning. The later rolls, beginning with the second year of Henry II., follow in succession year by year with hardly an interruption until the abolition of the Pipe Office in the reign of William IV. They are preserved and may be consulted in the Public Record Office.

Pp. 106-109.
Note on Domesday Book and the Great Rolls of the Exchequer.

The punishment inflicted on the moneyers for coining false money in the reign of Henry I. is recorded in Sim. Dunelm. ('Decem Scriptorum') Col. 254.

Pp. 110-111.
References concerning the punishment of coiners.

There are notices of the punishment to be inflicted on the same class in the 'Laws of King Æthelstan,' the 'Laws of King Edgar,' the 'Laws of King Ethelred,' and the 'Laws of King Cnut,' in the 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of England.'

The passage relating to the reign of Stephen, for which there are but scanty materials, is founded on that portion of Roger Hoveden which relates to the period; on the concluding passage in the 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle,' and on the 'Gesta Stephani Regis.' The terms of the Treaty of Peace are most fully given by Matthew Paris, who, though not a contemporary, may, perhaps, have had access to a contemporary document. It would be unsafe to accept his version alone, but there is no dispute respecting the general tenour of the agreement made at Wallingford between Stephen and his rival.

Pp. 111-115.
References concerning events in Stephen's reign.

The somewhat contradictory contemporary versions of Becket's quarrel with Henry II. have been collected by Giles in the first two of his volumes of 'Becket's Life and Letters.' The text, it is hoped, will not be found inconsistent with any of these accounts. The details of the murder are chiefly from the narrative of Edward Grim, an eye-witness, which, however, has been compared with the others. See Giles, vol. i. p. 76.

Pp. 115-118.
References concerning the murder of Becket, and the events which preceded it.

The Assise of Clarendon, a most important document, will be found in Palgrave's 'English Commonwealth,' vol. ii., pp. clxviii.—clxix., printed

Pp. 118-133.
References to Public Records, Glanville, &c., concerning legislation under Henry II. :
its relation to previous and subsequent laws, and to Trial by Jury.

from 'Bib. Reg.' 14, C. 2. A somewhat different text is given by Mr. Stubbs, in his 'Select Charters,' &c., pp. 137-139, from Bodl. Rawlinson, C. 641. 'Villata' has been translated 'vill' instead of township in the text, because the vagueness of the original seems to be, in this way, better preserved. 'Villate' is hardly English. It should also be mentioned, in addition to the explanation of the words

'lawful men' (legales homines) given in the text, that the expression implied freedom from legal disability of every kind (outlawry, excommunication, minority, infamy incurred by perjury, recreancy, etc.).

The functions of the reeve and twelve elder thanes of the wapentake are briefly described in the 'Laws of King Ethelred,' iii. 3. It is not there stated before whom their accusation is to be laid.

The compurgation by twelve in the Hundred, is mentioned in the 'Laws of William the Conqueror,' i. 51, and there only. It is an important connecting link between the reeve and his twelve assessors, the twelve jurors of the Hundred, according to the Assise of Clarendon, and the compurgators according to the wager of law. The oath in every case resolves itself at best into an oath concerning general repute. The later jury system was an adaptation of the old customs to new ideas of evidence.

The predominance of the number 12 in the Danish laws rather than in the laws not of Danish origin is further illustrated in 'Alfred's and Guthrum's Peace,' 3. The twelve men in each county sworn, under the Conqueror, to reproduce the Laws of Edward the Confessor are mentioned in the preamble to the Laws so called.

The wager of law is recognised by Glanville i. 9, and may be traced through the law-books for many centuries (see Coke upon Littleton, 294-295). It seems to have been the general legal doctrine that no

Pp. 123-124.
The Wager of Law.

wager of law could be allowed where trespass or injury with force was alleged against the defendant. Blackstone accepts this view, iii. 22. The following passages, however, may perhaps indicate that the wager of law was in some places more generally adopted. They also show the preference for the number 12 in the North. They are from the Court Roll of Cotam-Mandeville among the Durham Records in the Public Record Office, and are of the early part of the reign of Henry VI. :—

Memb. 2 dors. 'Nicolaus Watson queritur versus Johannem Neuton in placito transgressionis de eo quod interfecit unum porcum suum ad valenciam iii. s. cum uno baculo ad dampna Nicolai v. s. Et predictus defendit vim et injuriam et dicit quod in nullo est culpabilis et defendit per legem, unde habet diem ad vadiandum legem se septima manu ad proximam curiam cum vicinis vel se duodecima manu cum extraneis.'

And,

Memb. 3 dors. 'Thomas Webster queritur de Henrico Elwyk et Johanna uxore de eo quod ipsa interfecit unam ovem et agnum et unam aucam matricem ad dampna ipsius Henrici iiij. s. Et predicti Henricus et Johanna defendunt, etcetera; et dicunt quod non sunt inde culpabiles. Et inde profert facere legem, et unde habent diem de lege facienda se duodecima manu ad proximam curiam.'

The contemporaneous spelling and manner of extending contractions have been reproduced in the foregoing and other Latin records which have been printed for the first time in these Notes.

Note on the spelling, &c., of Latin documents.

Glanville describes the Grand Assise (and contrasts it with the duel), in his treatise 'De Legibus Angliæ,' lib. ii. cc. 1-17, and the punishment for jurors who committed perjury on the Grand Assise, in lib. ii. c. 19. The analogous inquest on persons alleged to have died in the crime of usury is mentioned by him in lib. vii. c. 16.

Pp. 124-128. The Grand Assise, &c.

The scheme for the selection of the jurors of the Hundred who were to make their presentments to the justices, at the beginning of the reign of Richard I., will be found in Rog. Hoveden, Ed. Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 262.

The Assise of Northampton (A.D. 1176) will be found in Bened. Abbas, i. 108, and the Inquest of Sheriffs is printed, from a MS. in the Bodleian Library, in Mr. Stubbs' 'Select Charters,' &c., where also the Assise of Northampton is reprinted.

It is possible to detect local influence still asserting itself on the Bench of itinerant justices even after the Inquest of Sheriffs. The names (which are given in the Pipe Rolls) show the need of the 21st article of the 'Capitula Placitorum Coronæ' of the reign of Richard I. It is there expressly provided that no sheriff shall be justice during his shrievalty, and that no one shall act as justice in any county of which he has been sheriff since the king's coronation (Rog. Hoved., Ed. Stubbs, vol. iii. p. 264). The remarks concerning the removal of sheriffs in the year 1170, or 16 Henry II., are founded on the list of sheriffs made by the author of the present work, from the Great Rolls of the Pipe, and printed in the 31st Report of the Deputy-Keeper of Public Records, pp. 262-366. The chroniclers, with their usual love of exaggeration, assert that 'nearly all' the sheriffs were displaced.

Savigny's 'Geschichte des römischen Rechts im Mittelalter' contains documents affording ample proof that the Roman Law was not forgotten on the Continent during the Middle Ages. The introduction of the subject among the studies at Oxford in the year 1138 is mentioned in Gervase ('Decem Scriptores') Col. 1665. Its influence upon the lawyers of the time of Henry II. may be inferred from the Prologue to Glanville's treatise, which is imitated, or rather copied, with very little variation, from the 'Proœmium' to Justinian's Institutes.

P. 133.
Note on the study of the Roman Law
in England.

The actual operation of the legal system sketched out in the Assises of Clarendon and Northampton becomes apparent in the series of Pipe Rolls in the Public Record Office. Thus in the roll of the year 22 Henry II., the 'Justicie errantes' are mentioned, and the pecuniary proceeds of their visits begin to appear in the accounts; but the eyre was not completed till the 23rd year, in which appear the amercements of counties which had escaped the visit of the justices in the 22nd year.

Pp. 135-137.
Note (with references to
the Great Rolls
of the Exchequer, &c.) upon the early operation of the system of eyres.

Some care is required to separate the accounts of one eyre from those of another, as the sums due were not paid at once, but in instalments, year after year, and the accounts of a new and an old eyre may appear on the same roll, or the accounts of a previous eyre on the roll of a year during which there was no eyre at all. The new accounts are distinguished from the old by the heading 'Nova Placita, Nove Conventiones.' But here again there is a possible source of error, as the same heading is applied to the new pleas, &c., belonging to jurisdictions other than those of the justices of the criminal eyre; and the justices in eyre are not usually designated by that name after 22 Henry II. But here also it is only necessary to bear in mind the subject-matter of which the justices in eyre had cognisance according to the Assise of Northampton, and the intervals of the criminal eyres at once become apparent. The result may be verified by an inspection of the names of the justices, which always show that the Bench of the true criminal eyre was composed in part, though not in every case wholly, of judges who were not merely local magnates, and who were, no doubt, connected with the central King's Court. With these precautions a little industry will suffice to detect that the eyre which followed that of 22 and 23 Henry II. was carried out in 24 and 25 Henry II., or, in other words, that from the commencement of one to the commencement of the other there was an interval of two years.

A comparison of the Pipe Rolls of the end of the reign of Henry II. seems to show that the interval between eyre and eyre had become already somewhat greater. The length of time occupied by an eyre, and, perhaps, the dilatoriness of some Exchequer clerks, which have rendered it necessary to describe a single eyre as belonging to two years, are throughout a source of confusion. There was, however, an eyre of which nearly all the accounts appear in the thirty-first, and another of which nearly all the accounts appear in the thirty-fourth year of the reign of Henry II., and if the interval between the two was not quite three years it must certainly have been more than two years.

Though there were to be four judicial visitations, in the year for holding assises of Novel Disseisin, according to John's Magna Carta, the eyre proper seems to have languished after the death of Henry II. The periods of the criminal eyres, however, could be ascertained only by a very careful inspection of the whole of the Pipe Rolls, and the result would hardly be worth the labour.

The extension of the interval between the eyres in the reign of Henry III. to seven years seems to be established by a passage in the 'Monachi Wigorniensis Annales,' 'Anglia Sacra,' i. 425. It there appears that a resolve was taken to resist the entry of the justices in eyre into Worcestershire, because seven years had not elapsed since their last visitation.

The division of criminal jurisdiction in Glanville's time (reign of Henry II.) into that of the justices in eyre, for greater offences, such as homicide, and that of the sheriff for minor offences, such as larceny, will be found in the last sentence of Glanville's work. The 'gemot' of the shire under the presidency of the sheriff was probably held at the same times every year as before the Conquest. See ante, pp. 443-444. The defects—and, indeed, the worthlessness—of these county courts, easily to be conjectured from the general state of society, are brought prominently forward in the statutes relating to criminal matters passed in the reign of Edward I.

It has been supposed that the distinction between Norman, or Frenchman, and Englishman was at an end in the reign of Henry II., and that all marks of inferiority had then been removed from the English people. The authority of the 'Dialogus de Scaccario' does undoubtedly seem at first sight amply sufficient to establish this belief. The treatise is in manuscript both in the Red Book and in the Black Book of the Exchequer, and is printed at the end of the 'History of the Exchequer' by Madox, who attributes it, apparently on good grounds, to 'Ricardus Filius Nigelli.' The supposed writer was Bishop of London in the reign of Richard I., and had previously been Treasurer at the Exchequer.

Pp. 137-139
Note (with
references to
the Great Rolls
of the Exchequer, the 'Dialogus de Scaccario,' Glanville, Bracton, the Statutes, &c.
concerning the end of the distinction between Norman and English-
man.

There is no necessity to controvert the received opinion with respect to the authorship of the 'Dialogus' or the period at which it was compiled. But there is no doubt that, whatever its authorship, it is incorrect in this well-known passage:—'. . . ut centuriata . . . fisco condemnaretur, quedam scilicet in xxxvi, quedam in xliiii l. . . .

‘Sed jam cohabitantibus Anglicis et Normannis et alterutrum uxores ducentibus vel nubentibus, sic permixtæ sunt nationes ut vix discerni possit hodie, de liberis loquor, quis Anglicus quis Normannus sit genere ; exceptis duntaxat adscriptitiis qui villani dicuntur quibus non est liberum, obstantibus dominis suis, a sui status conditione discedere. Ea propter pene quicumque sic hodie occisus reperitur, ut murdrum punitur, exceptis his quibus certa sunt, ut diximus, servilis conditionis indicia.’

In the first place the sum here alleged to have been paid by the Hundreds when a Frenchman had been slain is inconsistent with the passages relating to this subject in the Laws of the Conqueror and in the Laws attributed to Henry I. In the ‘Dialogus’ it is stated that the sum of forty-four pounds was in some cases paid for a single murder, whereas forty-seven or forty-six marks is the maximum according to the laws. The mark was two-thirds of the pound, and forty-four pounds would therefore be sixty-six marks. The Laws attributed to Henry I. are at any rate not of earlier date than his reign, and the fact that they agree so closely as they do with those of the Conqueror in the sum for which the Hundred was made liable renders it extremely improbable that there was any change in the interval between the compilation of the two sets of laws. It is also perfectly clear from the Pipe Roll of 31 Henry I. that the maximum did not exceed the sum mentioned in the Laws, and that, at this period at any rate, the maximum was rarely or never exacted. The Roll of Henry I. affords a most certain conclusion on this point, because, unlike some of later date, it contains the statement that each payment is for one murder, not as elsewhere ‘pro murdr,’ which might be one or many. The sums vary from a hundred shillings to fifteen marks ; in later Rolls the payments are not so large ; and there seems no alternative but to pronounce that the author of the ‘Dialogus’ was completely misinformed.

The Red Book has xxiiij. l. where the Black Book and Madox’s text have xliiii. l. ; but though the maximum is thus brought lower, it cannot be made to agree with the Laws or with the Rolls. The reading xxxvi. is common to both MSS. ; 36 l. would be 54 marks ; 24 l. would be 36 marks—the one sum too high, the other too low for the legal maximum, and both too high for the sum commonly exacted.

The statement that the distinction between Englishman and Frenchman had practically come to an end in these criminal matters is obviously of diminished authority when an important error has been detected in the context. It seems also to be sufficiently refuted by the considerations put forward in the text of the present work, which ought, however, perhaps to be confirmed by more specific references. In the Pipe Rolls of the latter part of the reign of Henry II., the ‘false present-

ments,' which must, no doubt, be interpreted as false presentments of Englishry, are very frequent, as are 'concealments;' and 'false presentments of Englishry' by name are to be found on the Pipe Roll 34 Henry II., under Berkshire, Somersetshire, &c. The presentment of Englishry is an essential feature in the 'Rotuli Curie Regis,' of which the earliest were published by the Record Commission, and edited by Sir Francis Palgrave. The entries are very short, but suffice to show the presentment in actual operation. One of the chief functions of the justices at this time (temp. Ric. I.) seems to have been to decide whether the presentment was duly made by the Hundred, and whether a death came under the technical definition of murder or not. Death by misadventure or starvation might be a 'murdrum' if there was no presentment of Englishry. Perhaps, however, the most convincing proof that the distinction between victors and vanquished was continued beyond this time is to be found in Bracton. He gives a definition of murder, which agrees in the main with that of Glanville. Glanville says (lib. xiv. c. 3): 'Dicitur murdrum quod nullo vidente, nullo sciente clam perpetratur, præter solum interfectorem et ejus complices, ita quod mox non assequatur clamor popularis.' According to Bracton: 'Murdrum est occulta extraneorum et notorum hominum occisio, a manu hominis nequiter perpetrata, et qua, nullo sciente vel vidente, facta est, præter solum interfectorem et suos coadjutores et fautores, et ita quod non statim assequatur clamor popularis.' Bracton, who lived in the reign of Henry III., is by no means a servile copier of Glanville, who lived in the reign of Henry II., and the account which he gives of the Hundred and of its murders is much fuller than that of his predecessor. But what is most remarkable is that the form of the 'presentment of Englishry,' which is wanting in Glanville, is given at length in Bracton. It might almost be inferred that this form had been finally matured in the period between the compilation of the two treatises—especially as French and English are carefully distinguished in charters of John's reign. Whether that is so or not, however, there is at least no doubt that the custom of proving a murdered person to be English, if possible, was in complete vitality in the time of Bracton, who states that the fact had to be proved by the nearest relatives (Bracton, pp. 134-135). This and the fact that the presentment of Englishry was not formally abolished before the Stat. 14 Ed. III., St. i. c. 4, seem to establish beyond all reasonable doubt that Englishmen were not equal with their conquerors in the eye of the law for some generations after the time at which it is commonly supposed that the nation ceased to wear any badge of subjection.

The testimony of the next of kin concerning the parentage of the dead deserves perhaps to be regarded as one of the links connecting the old system of procedure with our modern custom of deciding matters upon evidence.

The references concerning the progress of the towns are given in the notes to the next chapter.

The story of Bucquinte and the other housebreakers who were merchants in London is from Benedict Abbas, Ed. Stubbs, i. 155. The

Pp. 141-142.
Evidence of Crime in London and other towns in the 12th century.

persistence of the old regulation which made innkeepers responsible for their guests, from the period before the Conquest to the period under consideration and afterwards, and the stringent rules against night-walking, show clearly enough the lawlessness of the towns—the least lawless parts of the kingdom.

The assertions concerning false weights and measures, and other devices for cheating, are founded on the Great Rolls of the period, passim, and on Neckam, 'De Naturis Rerum,' c. clxxix. M.R. Series, p. 315.

The general description of the Court is from Mapes, 'De Nugis Curialium,' and in particular from Dist. i. 1-5, and 10, from Peter of Blois, especially Ep. xcv. (Editions of Migne or of Giles), from Neckam, 'De Nat. Rer.' cc. 40, 129, 158, etc., and from the tone of all the chroniclers and letter-writers.

Pp. 142-146.
References
concerning the Court of Henry II.

The details of the treatment of women and the views entertained concerning matrimony are from Neckam, 'De N. R.' c. 155, from Peter of Blois, Ep. lxxix., and from John of Salisbury, 'Polycrat.' lib. iii. cc. 4 and 14, and lib. viii. c. 11. An account of the love of gaming and the loaded dice will be found in Neckam, 'De N. R.' c. 183.

Pp. 146-148.
References
concerning the character of the clergy.

The appointment of the three Bishops as Chief Justices ('Archijusticiarios'), to check the iniquities of their subordinates, is mentioned in Rad. de Dic. ('Decem Scriptores'), An. 1179. Col. 605-6.

Richard I.'s lament over the depravity of his clergy is in Gervas. Chron. 1595.

Peter of Blois' description of a bishop of his time is among his Letters. Ep. xviii. (The numbering is the same in the editions both of Migne and of Giles.)

Pp. 148-149.
References
concerning the clerical brawl when the Primacy was in dispute.

The account of the dispute between the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and of the riot in the Council-chamber, is from Will. Newb. lib. iii. c. 1, from Rad. de Dic. ('Decem Scriptores') 588-589, and from Benedict Abbas, Ed. Stubbs (M.R. Series), vol. i. 112-113.

Pp. 149-151.
References
concerning the value and stealing of relics.

The early pilgrimages to the shrine of Becket are recorded in Benedict Abbas, vol. i. pp. 72 and 91.

The stealing of St. Petroc's body from one religious house at the instigation of another is narrated in Benedict Abbas, vol. i. pp. 178-180, and in Rog. Hoved., Ed. Stubbs, vol. ii. p. 136.

The statements concerning the distribution of charities and the real fountain-head of mediæval alms are founded on a careful inspection of the original Great Rolls of the Exchequer (Pipe) from year to year. These most valuable documents may be easily consulted in the Public Record Office, and the information of which use has been made in the text will be found in them at the beginning of the entries for each county. See especially the Rolls from 2 Henry II. to 10 Richard I. The fact that the religious houses did receive and lodge poor travellers is not disputed, and might be easily established by one of the articles in the Assise of Clarendon. In that most important document, secs. 15 and 18, will also be found the regulations respecting wayfarers arriving at a town, and the registration of those who fled [from their lords] out of one county into another.

Pp. 151-153.
Note and references to Records, &c., concerning the support of the sick and poor in the 12th century.

The rise, or reappearance, of various heresies in the South of France in the twelfth century is mentioned in Will. Newb. lib. i. c. 19, and in Chron. Gervas. ('Decem Scriptores') 1451. The appearance of the Paterines in England and their doctrines are described in Will. Newb. ii. 13, and in Mapes, 'De Nug. Cur.' Dist. i. c. 30; their sentence in Will. Newb. lib. ii. c. 13, confirmed by the Assise of Clarendon, sec. 21. The absence of all compassion for the condemned and starving heretics is most remarkable both in the account of William of Newburgh and in a letter of Peter of Blois, No. cxiii. Accounts of the Brabazons or heretical brigands will be found in the Chronicles already mentioned, and an indication of the manner in which their numbers were recruited, in Mapes, 'De Nug. Cur.' Distinct. i. c. 29.

Pp. 154-157.
Note and references concerning the doctrines and treatment of the first heretics in England.

The paragraph in which is sketched the history of the Jews in England immediately after the Conquest is founded on the 'Carta Judæorum Angliæ,' printed in the 'Rotuli Chartarum,' p. 93, on the notices of the Jews on the Great Roll of the Pipe 31 Hen. I., on Benedict Abbas, Ed. Stubbs, i. 182, and on various entries on the Great or Pipe Rolls of the reign of Henry II. (in the Public Record Office).

Pp. 157-159.
References concerning the Jews in England in the 12th century.

The coronation of Richard I., and the attack on the Jews by which it was followed, are described in Benedict Abbas, vol. ii. pp. 79-84, and the riot in Will. Newb. lib. iv. c. 1. There are accounts of the massacre of Jews at York in Will. Newb. lib. iv. cc. 9-10, and Bened. Ab. vol. ii. p. 107. The riots at Lynn, Stamford, and Lincoln, are mentioned in Will. Newb. iv. 7, 8, 9. It appears from Bened. Ab. vol. ii. p. 84, and from Will. Newb. lib. iv. c. 11, that a few of the culprits were hanged. The names of others and the amercements inflicted on them may be found on the

Pp. 159-163.
References concerning the coronation of Richard I., and the subsequent massacres of the Jews.

Pipe Roll 3 Ric. I. Ro. 1 dors., and Ro. 6, and repeated on the Pipe Roll 4 Ric. I. (in the Public Record Office).

The rapid sketch of the first two Crusades is from the 'Gesta Dei per Francos.' For the First Crusade see especially Willermus Tyriensis, lib. i. cc. 27-29, and Albertus Aquensis, lib. i. cc. 25-28. For the conduct of the Count of Tripoli see Will. Tyr. lib. 21. But the whole of the 'Gesta' illustrate the morals of the period.

Pp. 164-166.
References
concerning the first two Crusades, and the morals of the Crusaders.

Richard's character is apparent enough in the contemporary Chronicles. For his various revolts against his father it may in this place suffice to refer to Bened. Abbas, Ed. Stubbs, i. 42, ii. 7, 9, 61, etc., and to Rog. Hoveden (Ed. Stubbs), vol. ii. pp. 47, 362, etc. The ordinances for the voyage to the Holy Land appear in Rog. Hoved. vol. iii. p. 36 (Ed. Stubbs). They have been printed from Hoveden in Rymer's Fœdera (Record Commission Edition), vol. i. part i. p. 52.

Pp. 166-169.
References
concerning the character of Richard I.,
and the Ordinances for the punishment of Crusaders in the third Crusade.

CHAPTER III.

THE charter of William I. to London is printed (from the alleged original) in the 'Munimenta Gildhallæ Londoniensis'—'Liber Custumarum,' vol. ii. part ii. p. 504, edited by Mr. Riley for the M.R. Series, and the charter of Henry I., from an 'Inspeximus' on the Patent Roll, 2 Edward IV. part v., in Rymer's 'Fœdera,' vol. i. p. 11, Rec. Com. Edn. In the latter charter appear the exemption of the City from the 'murdum,' the privilege of trial by compurgation, and the right of hunting. A charter of the reign of Henry II. to Lincoln ('Fœdera,' i. 40, Rec. Com. Edn., from the 'Cartæ Antiquæ,' formerly in the Tower) contains a general confirmation of ancient liberties and laws extending back to the time of Edward the Confessor; but some doubt seems to have arisen in the interpretation of the passage, for by a later charter of the reign of Richard I. ('Fœdera,' i. 52, Rec. Com. Edn., from the same source) the 'quietantia murdri' is granted in express terms. Winchester receives, in the first year of Richard's reign, a charter ('Fœdera,' i. 50, Rec. Com. Edn., from the 'Cartæ Antiquæ'), in which the citizens have the privilege of clearing themselves in Pleas of the Crown 'secundum antiquam consuetudinem civitatis.' Gloucester acquires the same privilege by John's charter ('Rot. Chart.' p. 56).

Pp. 170-175.
Charters showing the privileges acquired by the towns during the first two centuries after the Conquest; freedom from the murder-fine, &c.

Among the towns which had, in the reign of John, acquired for their inhabitants the privilege of clearing themselves in Pleas of the Crown, in the same manner as the citizens of London, were Lincoln, Norwich, and Northampton. See the 'Rotuli Chartarum,' published by the Record Commission, pp. 5, 20, 45, 56; and for Lincoln see also the charter of Richard, to which reference has already been made.

Richard's charter to Colchester, with privilege of hunting, is printed in the form of an 'Inspeximus' of the reign of Edward IV. in Madox's 'Firma Burgi,' p. 28. An instance, by no means singular, of the grant of a borough to its inhabitants honorifice, in the terms in which land is commonly granted, occurs in the charter to Huntingdon ('Rotuli Chartarum,' p. 157).

The existence of a Guild Merchant at Lincoln, from the time of Edward the Confessor downwards, is asserted in the charter, already mentioned, of the reign of Henry II. References have been given (at p. 440) to Domesday concerning the pre-Norman guilds at Dover and Canterbury; and, from the manner in which the 'Burgenses' of various other towns are mentioned collectively in the book, there is good reason to suspect that guilds existed where they have not been described under that name. See especially Norfolk, p. 16, where twelve burgesses are said to have held a church. The 'xii. lagemanni' of Lincoln itself may indeed have been a hereditary town-corporation. The charter of John, in which the guild merchant is described as already existing at Gloucester, will be found in the 'Rot. Chart.' pp. 56-57. Of the previous charters to Gloucester one is of the reign of Henry II. ('Cartæ Antiquæ,' DD. 3), and one of the reign of Richard I. ('Cartæ Antiquæ,' DD. 4). In both the 'Burgenses' are mentioned, in neither the guild; and it is by no means improbable that wherever 'Burgenses' are mentioned as a body, a guild of burgesses or a guild merchant is meant. The statement that the numerous charters of John's reign in which towns are permitted to have their guild merchant and hanse or hanse-house, do not necessarily imply the creation of a new institution, but may be simply intended to confirm an ancient custom, is further justified by such passages as the following. In the charter to Ipswich ('Rot. Chart.' p. 65) the words are 'Concessimus . . . quod habeant gildam mercatoriam et hansam suan'—that they may have their guild merchant and hanse. The words 'suan hanshus' are used in Archbishop Thurstan's charter to the men of Beverley in the reign of Henry I.; and 'sua hanshus' is there mentioned as belonging to the citizens of York ('Fœdera,' Rec. Com. Edn., i. 10, from the 'Cartæ Antiquæ'). Henry II. confirms to the men of Southampton their guild as they had it in the time of Henry I. ('Inspeximus' of the reign of Edward III., printed in Madox's 'Firma Burgi,' p. 27). In many other cases the words are simply 'concessimus eis gildam mercatoriam,' as in the charters to Lynn and Yarmouth ('Rot. Chart.' pp. 138 and 175); but even this form is quite consistent with the previous existence of a guild merchant, which was now to be placed on a legal footing. Instances, too, of various guilds or communes existing without warrant have been collected from the Pipe Rolls of the reign of Henry II., by Madox ('Firma Burgi,' pp. 26, 27). The establishment of a new guild in a town which previously had no corporation of any kind seems to be indicated by the form of the grant to Niort ('Rotuli Chartarum,' p. 59):—'concessimus quod burgenses de Niorto faciant et habeant communam in villa sua de Niorto.' A question might, of course, be raised whether a 'communa' is precisely the same thing as a guild merchant or town guild such as existed in England; it seems to be sufficiently

Pp. 173-174.
Note and references to Charters, Chartres, &c., concerning the guilds or communes of towns at the end of the 12th century, and beginning of the 13th.

answered by the words of Glanville: 'Item si quis natus quiete per unum annum et unum diem in aliqua villa privilegiata manserit, ita quod in eorum communam, sicut gildam, tanquam civis receptus fuerit, eo ipso a villenagio liberabitur.' Lib. v. c. 5. One edition has, instead of 'communam, sicut gildam,' the reading 'communem gildam' (for which there appears to be no good MS. authority); another has 'communiam, scilicet gildam.' Mr. Stubbs, the Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford, informs me that of the two Bodleian MSS. of Glanville, one reads 'communiam s. gildam,' the other 'communam s. gildam.' The MS. in the British Museum, Reg. 14. C. 2, to which I referred upon his recommendation, and which appears to be the best, reads 'communam sicut gildam.' The Cottonian MS., Claud. D. 2, reads, 'communam scilicet gildam.' All the MSS. seem, therefore, practically to imply that a guild is a kind of 'communa.' Further confirmation is to be found in the fact that 'communa' is often used as an equivalent for a guild of any kind in those ordinances of guilds which are written in Latin. See Toulmin Smith's 'English Gilds,' p. 201, and the text of the ordinances printed in that book. The whole Jewry collectively is sometimes described as the 'communa' of the Jews of England. The Jews had, too, a communa in each of the towns in which they were permitted to reside, and their communa paid the tallage very much as the 'commune concilium' of a town, or its representatives paid dues claimed from the town as a whole. It seems to follow that where there was no 'communa' there was no guild, and that wherever there was a guild there was ipso facto a communa, though there might have been a communa where, perhaps, there was not, according to technical language, a guild. See the Jews' Rolls, Pells (Exchequer of Receipt), passim.

The acquisition of freedom by a villein, through residence for a year and a day in a chartered town, is mentioned in the passage just quoted from Glanville; it is also expressly confirmed in the charters to some of the towns, as for instance, in the charters of Henry II. to Lincoln and Nottingham (Rymer, 'Fœdera,' i. p. 41, Rec. Com. Edition, from the 'Cartæ Antiquæ'), and in the charter of John to Hereford ('Rot. Chart.' p. 22). The privilege was, no doubt, claimed, if not allowed, at a much earlier date. It appears among the Customs of Newcastle-on-Tyne, said to have existed in the time of Henry I., drawn up in the reign of Henry II., and preserved in the Tower. See the 'Acts of Parliament of Scotland,' vol. i., Preface, pp. 33-34. Note. (There is a short confirmation printed in Rymer.) 'Burgagium' is there mentioned as the condition of a free-townsmen in opposition to that of a villein. A free tenure existed before the Conquest in favour, if not of individual burgesses, at least of the burgesses of a city collectively.

Pp. 174-175.
References to Charters, &c., concerning freedom acquired by fugitive villans after a year's sojourn in a chartered town and concerning burgage-tenure.

Thus according to Domesday, Kent, p. 3, there were lands which the burgesses of Canterbury ‘tenebant, in alodia, de Rege.’

It may be possible to trace ‘the principle of representation in the jury of the Hundred and other judicial contrivances, but the towns

Pp. 176-178.
Charters showing the growth of the representative principle in towns

seem to afford the first example of representation combined with a true election as distinguished from a mere nomination made directly or indirectly by the Sheriff. This is only the natural consequence of the charters, of which the most important rendered the towns independent of the Sheriffs.

Instances in which the ‘commune concilium’ was to elect its representatives and send them to Westminster to treat with the Chief Justice, and render an account, will be found in the charters to Gloucester and Ipswich, in the reign of John (‘Rotuli Chartarum,’ pp. 57 and 65). Charters to other towns at the same period show that the same principle was coming into operation elsewhere, though not yet carried out in its integrity. See the charters to Shrewsbury and Derby (‘Rotuli Chartarum,’ pp. 142 and 138).

The statement that the chief commerce of England was the export of wool to Flanders, and the inference that the greater part of the land

Ip. 178-179.
Records, &c.,
concerning early English commerce
after the Conquest.

was grass-land, are founded upon a careful inspection of the original Pipe Rolls for a long series of years, extending as far as the beginning of the reign of Edward III. The notices of guilds of weavers in various towns in the twelfth century have been collected from the earliest of these Rolls by Madox in his ‘History of the Exchequer,’ c. 10, § 5. For the other illustrations of English trade at this period, see Hemmingford alias Hemingburgh, iii. 27, the Patent Rolls 55 Henry III., mm. 6, 10, 15; 5 Edward II., part 2, m. 5; and 2 Edward III. m., 14.

It was by the Statute of Merchants 13 Edward I. and by the Statute of Westminster the Second (c. 18), of the same year, that land became a security for debt. By the one was created that species of estate upon condition which was known as an estate held by Statute Merchant, by the other that which was known as an estate by elegit. In each case the land was held in pledge by the creditor until the debt was paid.

The roll upon the authority of which the proportion of town population to country population has been estimated in the text is the Vascon Roll,

Pp. 179-183.
Roll showing the distribution of population in England under Edward II.

18 Edward II., part i., written in the French of the period. It would be difficult to overrate the importance of the evidence which it furnishes when regarded as a whole. Its value was known to Sir Matthew Hale. In his MSS. in Lincoln’s Inn Library, vol. lxxxvi. under the heading ‘Musters and Souldiers’ appears this note:—‘De numero hominum ad militiam electorum separatim singulis locis et comitatibus Angliæ, quibus instructi armis, &c. (Vascon. Rot. 18 Ed. II.).’ It is possible, indeed, that the scribe may have carelessly omitted one or two names (as, for instance, those of Colchester and Cambridge), or may have intended to insert them at another time, but there is no reason to doubt that the record gives a faithful account of England in the main, and may be fully trusted. It is strange that a document so rich in information should not have been printed in any of the editions of Rymer's 'Fœdera,' and still more strange that extracts should have been made from the second part of the Roll, which is not in any way of so remarkable a character. Such an extraordinary omission well justifies the remark thrown out by Sir T. D. Hardy in his Syllabus of the 'Fœdera,' that a 'Supplement' is urgently required.

The statement that Jews inhabiting their quarter of each large town were, like certain Christian inhabitants, styled a 'communa,' is founded on a Roll headed '4, incip. 5, Edward I.,' among the Jews' Rolls (Pells) in the Public Record Office. Elsewhere (Bundle 556, No. 8) it appears that there was a 'communa' of the whole of the Jews in England.

Pp. 184-188.
Records, &c.,
concerning the position of the Jews before Pandulf became Legate.

The regulations for the Jewry under Richard I. will be found in Rog. Hoved., vol. iii. pp. 266-67, Ed. Stubbs, and the substance of them in the 'Memorials of Richard I.,' vol. i. (Itin. Reg. Ric.), Ed. Stubbs, p. 449.

The story of the Jew of Bristol is from Matthew Paris, 'Historia Major,' anno 1210.

Tovey's 'Anglia Judaica' contains at p. 79 the order (printed from the Close Roll 2 Hen. III., Part 2, m. 10) for all Jews to wear a badge, and at p. 77 a document (from the same roll and membrane) which shows that the Jews were a common object of attack to the Crusaders in England. The attempt of Stephen Langton to apply the badge to Jewesses as well as Jews will be found in the 'Concil. Oxon.,' A.D. 1222, Wilkins, i. 591.

Pandulf's policy of expulsion and his complaint that the clergy, and especially the Abbot of Westminster, were oppressed by their Jewish creditors may be seen in the 'Royal Letters,' Henry III., No. 369, Public Record Office. (Printed M.R. Series, vol. i., pp. 35-36.)

Pp. 188-190.
Records showing that the Clergy were in debt to the Jews, and desired their expulsion.

The pledging of tithes by the parson of Morcott is mentioned in the 'Ancient Miscellanea, Exchequer, Queen's Remembrancer, Jews,' Bundle 556, No. 1, in the Public Record Office. It appears by the same Roll that the parsons of Luffenham and Whissendine, and the Prior and Canons of Brock were also in debt to the Jews—and this as early as the reign of Richard I. The interest charged varies from a penny to threepence per week per pound lent.

The cartoon, in which Isaac the Jew, of Norwich, is the principal figure, is drawn on the Jews' Roll (Pells), 17 Henry III., in the Public Record Office. His wealth and position, as one of the chief Jews, are made apparent by the Close Roll 9 Henry III., m. 1 (vol. ii: page 67 b. of the edition printed by Sir Thomas Hardy), and by the 'Royal Letters,' Henry III., No. 736 (page 18 of vol. i. in the 'Royal Letters' printed in the M.R. series). Mosse Mokke is mentioned as a Norwich Jew in the Fine Rolls (printed by the Record Commission), vol. i. p. 285, and as having been hanged—no doubt for some alleged offence against the coin—at p. 408.

Particulars concerning the appearance of the 'Causini' 'Caturcenses,' or Pope's money-changers ('scambiatores' or 'mercatores') in England will be found in Matthew Paris, 'Historia Major,' annis 1235, 1253, &c., and in the 'Historia Minor,' M.R. series, vol. ii., pp. 382-384. The attempt of the clergy to deprive the Jews of food appears on the Close Roll of 7 Henry III., part 2, m. 29, d., printed in 'Anglia Judaica,' p. 83.

That the offences of concealing property and bribing the justices were commonly practised by the Jews is established by the Close Roll, 36 Henry III., m. 14, dors. (printed in 'Anglia Judaica,' p. 131), taken in connection with Matthew Paris, annis 1251 and 1252.

For particulars of a riot in which the Jewish quarter was the object of attack, see Patent Roll, 48 Henry III., m. 11 ('Anglia Judaica,' pp. 161-162). For losses sustained by the Jews through protections given against them in favour of the Crusaders, see 'Royal Letters,' Henry III., No. 601 (vol. ii. p. 98). The pledging of the Jewry to the king's brother, the Earl of Cornwall, is mentioned in the Patent Roll, 39 Henry III., m. 13 (Rymer's 'Foedera,' i. 315); its transfer to Edward, the king's son, in the Close Roll, 46 Henry III., m. 19 ('Anglia Judaica,' p. 157); and to the Causines, in the Patent Roll, 47 Henry III., m. 9 ('Ang. Jud.,' pp. 158-159). The regulations by which it was rendered illegal for Jews to possess a freehold are given in 'Anglia Judaica,' pp. 188-191, from a MS. in the Bodleian (N. E. A. 19).

The Statute of the Jewry (temp. Ed. I.) is printed in the Statutes of the Realm, i. 221. A document which recites crimes committed by the Jews against the Catholic faith, and ends with a command that Jewesses should wear badges, is on the Close Roll, 7 Edward I., m. 6. d. ('Anglia Jud.,' p. 208).

Particulars of the alleged crucifixion of a child by Jews at Lincoln, and of the subsequent trial, are given in Matthew Paris, 'Historia Major,' anno 1255 (Wats. p. 785); in the 'Royal Letters,' Henry III., No. 193, printed M.R. series, vol. ii. p. 110; and in the Patent Roll, 40 Henry III. m. 17, d. ('Angl. Jud.,' pp. 137-138). The insult to the Cross at Oxford, and punish-

Pp. 190-191.
References in explanation of a caricature of Jews, A.D.
1233.

P. 192.
References
concerning the 'Pope's moneychangers.'

Pp. 192-193.
References
concerning bribery of Justices by Jews.

Pp. 193-194.
Records showing a change in the position of the Jews.

P. 194.
Statute of the Jewry, &c.

Pp. 194-196.
References
concerning charges against the Jews, executions, &c.

ment of Jews for the offence are detailed in the Close Roll, 53 Henry III. m. 12 ('Angl. Jud.' pp. 170-173). The hanging of 218 Jews in London alone, besides a great number in other cities, for offences against the coinage, is mentioned in the 'Chron. Dunst.' (Ed. Luard, M.R. series), p. 279, and in the 'Flor. Hist.' attributed to Matt. Westm., p. 409, etc. The practice of laying false informations against Jews after these executions is the subject of an instrument on the Close Roll, 7 Ed. I. m. 7 ('Angl. Jud.' pp. 211-213).

In London a Jews' synagogue had been given to the Friars Penitent according to Close Roll, 56 Henry III. m. 3 ('Ang. Jud.' pp. 192-193). It appears in a letter from Peckham, Archbishop of Canterbury, to the Bishop of London that Jews were afterwards forbidden to hold religious services in their own houses, on the ground that, according to law, no more than one synagogue in any town was permissible. See Wilkins, 'Concilia,' vol. ii. p. 88 (from Reg. Peckh. f. 16, a).

At p. 180 of the same volume appears sentence of exile passed on the Jews at a synod held in London. This document, however, is not well authenticated, and, much as the clergy might desire such a decree, they had not the power to enforce it. But the fact that the Jews were expelled by the secular power is proved by writs relating to the matter directed to the sheriffs of various counties in the 18th year of the reign of Edward I. See Close Roll, 18 Ed. I. m. 6 ('Anglia Jud.' p. 240), and Patent Roll, 18 Ed. I. m. 14 ('Anglia Judaica,' p. 241).

Pp. 196-197.
Note and references concerning the expulsion of the Jews.

The number of Jewish exiles is stated to have been 16,511 in the 'Flores Hist.' attributed to Matthew of Westminster, anno 1290 (p. 414).

Edward's promise to devote the proceeds of the Jews' houses to pious uses appears on the Patent Roll, 19 Ed. I., m. 20. His actual grant of synagogues and burial-grounds to the clergy is established by a document preserved in the Tower of London and now in the Public Record Office. Its description is 'Tower Records Miscell.' No. 74. It is headed 'Littere Patentis de concessionibus factis de domibus que fuerunt Judeorum in Anglia.' These Letters Patent, bearing date 19 and 20 Edward I., were also enrolled on the Originalia Roll, 20 Ed. I., from which they have been printed, not quite accurately, in the 'Rotulorum Originalium Abbreviatio,' vol. i. p. 73. The debts of the clergy to the Caursins, and the bitter complaints excited, are mentioned at length in Matth. Paris (Ed. Wats.), pp. 417-419, anno 1235.

Pp. 197-198.
Records concerning the appropriation of the Jews' goods, &c.

Some data for estimating the value of £100,000—the loss sustained through the robbery of the Treasury in the reign of Edward I.—are to be found in Matthew Paris, anno 1245, where the amount of the national revenue is stated to have been less than 60,000 marks or £40,000, and in the Patent Roll 5 Edward III., part 3, m. 4, according to which the

P. 199.
Note and
references
concerning the value of £100,000 (stolen from the Royal Treasury,
Ed. I.)

Merchants' company of the 'Bardi' are to have (with certain limitations) the customs of London, Boston, Hull, Lynn, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Hartlepool, and Southampton, for which they are to give the king 1000 marks per month. Compare also Matt. Par. anno 1252, where the 'reditus merus Regis' is said to be less than a third of 70,000 marks. It is, however, impossible to fix definitely the value of the pound sterling at any period of the middle ages, though many writers on prices have grappled with the problem. The whole of the conditions of life are so completely altered that it is impossible to exclude false assumptions in attempting to make the calculation. The most useful collection of facts relating to the subject, is, perhaps, to be found in the 'History of Prices,' by Mr. J. E. T. Rogers. The Treasury liberally granted aid from the Public Record Office for the compilation of the work, and the materials brought together by Mr. F. S. Haydon of that office are of the highest value.

The particulars of the robbery of the Royal Treasury have been collected from the following sources. The first commission to enquire,

Pp. 197-203.
Note and
references to Records, &c.,
concerning the proceedings
after the great robbery at the Royal Treasury.

dated June 6, is printed in Rymer's 'Fœdera' (Record Com. Edition), vol. i. part 2, p. 956, from the Patent Roll, 31 Edward I., m. 21, d. The functions of the juries under this commission were somewhat analogous to those of grand juries. Their finding was not to be final, but the persons declared guilty by them were to be imprisoned until the king gave further commands. The second commission, dated October 10 (Rymer, p. 959, from the same Roll, m. 12, d.), appoints justices to hear and determine the case, and refers to the assertion of the accused abbot and monks that they were wholly innocent; the juries are to be selected from Surrey and Middlesex. A third and amended commission issued on November 10 (Rymer, p. 960, from the same Roll, m. 9, d.). It is there mentioned that juries are to be summoned from the City of London as well as from Surrey and Middlesex. Both in the second and in the third commission the value of the treasure stolen is estimated at £100,000. The information laid before the justices and the verdicts of the juries under the first commission of enquiry, and under the final commission of November 10 to try the accused, as well as Podelicote's confession, are recorded in rolls which were found among the 'County Bags,' and which are now known as 'Exchequer, Treasury of Receipt, Miscellanea, &c.' From these have been extracted the details which throw suspicion on the abbot and monks, and indicate a conspiracy in which they were concerned with some officials at the Palace. The attempts of the monks who wrote annals to exculpate the men of their own order are excessively feeble. There are two different though very brief accounts of the affair in the 'Chronica et Annales' of one house. In one place it is stated that the robbery was effected by a single thief, in another that most atrocious traitors and thieves were the culprits. (William Rishanger, Ed. Riley, M.R. series, p. 222 and p. 420.) The judges are, of course, described as perverse, and their conduct as iniquitous in the 'Chronicle of the Monk of Rochester' (Cotton, Nero, D. ii. fo. 192, b., 193) and in Rishanger, p. 225, in the latter of which passages the liberation of the monks is mentioned. But the scandalous discord between the abbot and his monks after they were restored to the Abbey, and the charges brought by one against the other seem to be a sufficient justification of the verdicts given by the juries and of the sentences pronounced by the justices. (Rishanger, p. 420.)

The account of the ordeal in the reign of John, and of the hanging of a prisoner who was convicted by it, is from the 'Placita Assisarum et Corone,' held at Lichfield in the fifth, and at Lincoln in other years of John's reign, which are fully transcribed in the Petyt MSS. in the Inner Temple Library.

P. 204.
References
concerning the later ordeal and its abolition.

The abolition of the ordeal in England (A.D. 1219) appears in a document printed in Rymer's 'Fœdera' (Record Com. Ed.), vol. i. part 1, p. 154, from the Patent Roll, 3 Henry III., m. 5. The difficulty of substituting another form of trial is there almost ludicrously manifest.

The interrupted duel to try the right to an advowson, and the decision of the king and council concerning recreancy, are the subjects of an instrument on the Patent Roll, 55 Hen. III., m. 3. The reference was found in the Hale MSS. With the exception that the parties could fight in person in the duel which decided a criminal charge, it does not appear that there was any difference between it and the duel which decided a civil cause. In the document to which reference has been made, each champion is designated by a term which implies the use of the fists, 'pugil.' It is generally believed, however, that in the ordinary duel sticks were used. The battle of treason was a very different proceeding, and a full account of it is given at p. 389 from a treatise of the reign of Henry V. written by the King's Armourer and Sergeant.

Pp. 204-206.
References
concerning the Trial by Battle.

Bracton, lib. iii. c. 22 (fo. 143), is the authority for the examination of the accusing jury by the judges, and for the fact that after examination and challenge the same jury delivered a second verdict, which was final. He also shows, lib. iii. c. 19 (fo. 138, b.), that in the time of Henry III. a person 'appealed' could throw himself upon 'the country,' which would then pronounce

Pp. 206-208.
References
concerning the growth of the petty jury.

only one verdict. The distinction between the two forms of accusation should be well borne in mind by any one who wishes to understand the growth of trial by jury in criminal cases.

Fortescue's 'Laudes Legum Angliæ' (temp. Hen. VI.), chapter 26, shows that jurors were still regarded as witnesses, but that, in civil cases, and apparently in them only, other witnesses were sworn in court and examined before the jury.

Pp. 208-209. For the difficulty or impossibility of obtaining a conviction by appeal, see pp. 289 and 481 of the present volume.

Instances in which persons standing mute (but found by juries to be of ill fame) were hanged in the fifth year of Henry III. are printed, from the Roll of 'Placita Coron. coram Justic. Itin. Com. Warwic.' in Emlyn's note to his edition of Hale's 'Pleas of the Crown,' vol. ii. p. 321-323. On the 'Liberate' Roll (Chancery), 3 Edward I., m. 12, is an account of the expenses incurred by the Sheriff of Yorkshire in his attack upon malefactors, 'in quo idem Walterus [the leader of the gang] et quidam fautores sui predicti se secundum legem et consuetudinem regni nostri justiciari non permittentes decapitati fuerant.' The reference to this passage (not correctly given) was found in the Hale MSS. with the meaning attached to it in the text.

The statute relating to the 'prison forte et dure' for those who refused to stand to the law is 3 Edward I. (Westminster the First), c. 12 (Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. p. 29). The curious case by which the operation of the law is illustrated, and in which, as alleged, a woman was saved from death by starvation through a miracle, is recorded on the Patent Roll, 31 Edward III., Part i. m. 11. Reference has been made to this also in the Hale MSS., and the document has been printed in the 'Fœdera.'

The case of mailhem cited in illustration of the brutality of manners, which was at once an effect and a cause of punishment by mutilation, is from 'King's Bench, Mich., 7 and 8 Edward I., Ro. 13,' printed in Emlyn's notes to Hale's 'Pleas of the Crown,' vol. ii. p. 325. The instance of mutilation to which a man was condemned for an offence committed in the presence of King Edward III. is from the 'Rotulus Calisie, 21 Edward III., No. 22,' to which a reference was found among the Hale MSS. The proper description for reference in the Public Record Office is Patent Roll, 21 Edward III., Part iv. m. 22. The Roll consists of instruments dated at Calais, whence its ancient name.

For an indication of the state of the Forest Laws under Canute, see the 'Laws of King Cnut,' Secular, c. 81. The statement that the Forest Laws were of a growth earlier than the Conquest is confirmed

Pp. 210-211.
Records, &c.,
concerning the
'prison forte et dure,' and standing mute.

Pp. 211-213.
Evidence
concerning mutilation, &c.
(Edward I.— Edward III.)

by such terms as 'Swain-mote,' which seems to have been a court of inferior jurisdiction to that of the Justices in Eyre for forest-pleas, precisely as the ancient shire-moot was, under the Normans, a court of inferior jurisdiction to that of the Justices in Eyre commonly so called.

Pp. 213-215.
References
concerning the Forest Laws.

For mention of the swain-mote see the Forest-Charter of Henry III., Statutes of the Realm, vol. i., Charters of Liberties, p. 20.

For the provision that none shall in future lose life or limb for taking the king's venison see the same Charter, p. 21. See also p. 20 for the expeditation of dogs, which is the subject of a clause in the 'Assisa de Foresta' of Henry II., Benedict Abbas, ii. clxi.-clxiv., and Hoveden, ii. 245-247 (both Ed. Stubbs).

The remarks upon the nature of the courts and prisons of the barons, and of the manner in which the barons abused their privileges in the time of Henry III., are founded on Bracton, lib. 3, c. 8. fo. 123, b., and on the 'Statutum de Marleberge,' 52 Henry III., c. 1 (Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. p. 19). This subject is further illustrated by the 'Placita de Quo Warranto,' and 'Rotuli Hundredorum' (published by Record Com.), passim.

Pp. 217-218.
Evidence
concerning the privileges of the Barons.

A writ (of the time of Henry III., A.D. 1233) for the conservation of the Peace is printed in Rymer's 'Foedera,' vol. i. part i. p. 209, from Close Roll, 17 Henry III., m. 9, d.

Another writ, showing the connection of the Watch and Ward with the Assise of Arms, is printed in the 1640 edition of Matthew Paris, four pages before the index, and at the end of the Adversaria. The clause relating to an escort for merchants is also in the same volume (in the 'Auctarium Ad-ditamentorum'), p. 1145.

Pp. 218-223.
References
concerning the 'Conservation of the Peace,'
the Division of the Courts, the Justices of Trailbaston, the origin of Justices of the Peace, &c.

The Statute of Winchester (13 Ed. I.) is printed in the Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. p. 96. The parallel clause referring to perjuries in civil actions is in the Statute of Westminster the First (3 Edward I.), c. 38 (Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. p. 36).

For provisions relating to Justices of Assise, or Nisi Prius, see the Statute of Westminster the Second, 13 Edward I., c. 30 (Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. pp. 85-6). For those relating specially to Justices of Gaol Delivery, see 27 Edward I., c. 3, and the Statute of Northampton, 2 Edward III., c. 2 (Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. pp. 129-30, and p. 258).

An instance of a special commission to try cases not pending elsewhere occurs in the so-called Statute of Rageman, 4 Edward I. (Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. p. 44). An ordinance respecting 'Trailbastons' is entered on the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 33 Edward I., No. 10 (Printed, vol. i. p. 178). The word Trailbaston appears only in the margin, but the offences described are as nearly as possible those which are the subject of special commissions in later years, and of which a full account is given in Chapter IV. An indication of the feeling against special commissions in general may be detected in the Statute 18 Edward III., St. 2. cc. 1 and 2, Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. pp. 300-1, in which latter the powers of Guardians of the Peace are defined. See also 34 Edward III., c. 1, Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. p. 364, and 42 Edward III., c. 4. A Petition in Parliament concerning persons convicted before Justices of Trailbaston, and afterwards placed on Juries and Inquests to injure their accusers, appears in the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 35 Edward I., No. 63 (vol. i. p. 201). The recommendation of Parliament that there should be elected in each county six Guardians of the Peace, rather than Justices of Trailbaston coming from a distance, was made in 21 Edward III., No. 70 ('Rotuli Parliamentorum,' vol. ii. p. 174).

It is to chapters 3 and 7 of the Statute of Northampton (2 Edward III.), that reference seems to be made in the special commissions mentioned in Chapter IV., and in the later Commissions of the Peace. In the reign of Henry VI., the Justices of the Peace are required to enforce the provisions of the older Statutes of Winchester, Northampton, Cambridge, and others relating to labourers and liversies.

The Statute of Treasons, in part, no doubt, declaratory, is 25 Edward III., Stat. 5, c. 2 (Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. pp. 319-20).

On the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 5 Edward II., No. 20 (vol. i. p. 283), will be found the accusation and sentence against Piers Gavaston. An error which appears in the State Trials has been copied from history into history. It is commonly stated that Gavaston was to be declared a public enemy only if he returned from exile. In the original it is stated explicitly that it is as a public enemy he is banished, and that as a public enemy he will be treated should he return. His execution is mentioned in Trokelowe, 'Annales,' p. 77 (Ed. Riley, M.R. Series).

The case of the Despensers is illustrated by the Close Roll, 15 Edward II., m. 14, by Trokelowe, 'Annales' (Ed. Riley, M.R. Series), p. 108, and by the Close Roll, 20 Edward II., m. 3, d., which shows that the barons at Bristol claimed the authority of a Parliament to execute whom they pleased. For the executions, see De la Moor (Camden's 'Anglica, Normannica,' &c., pp. 599, 600).

The form of sentence in high treason, with the reasons for disembowelling, is from the 'Coram Rege' Roll (Queen's Bench, Crown Side), 18 Edward II., Hilary, 'Rex,' m. 34, d. The reference to this passage was found in the Petyt MSS.

Pp. 223-224.
Statute of Treasons.

Pp. 224-225.
Records, &c.,
concerning the cases of Gavaston and the Des-pensers.

P. 226.
Early Record
concerning the punishment for High Treason.

in the Inner Temple Library, 'Theatrum Criminalium.' It appears from other parts of the same Roll that some criminals were drawn for treason, and hanged for other offences. It is at this time apparently that the full punishment for treason was invented.

The proceedings in the deposition of Edward II. are recorded on the Close Roll, 20 Edward II., m. 3, d., in the 'Apologia Adæ Orleton,' ('Decem Scriptores,' col. 2765), and in De la Moor's 'Life and Death of Edward II.' (printed in Camden's 'Anglica, Normannica,' &c., p. 603). The condemnation of Roger Mortimer appears on the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 4 Edward III., No. 1 (vol. ii. p. 52). The judgment against him was annulled in Parliament, and the lands restored to his heir. See 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 28 Edward III., Nos. 8-12 (vol. ii. pp. 255-6).

Mortimer's confession that the Earl of Kent had been wrongfully put to death, and a statement that the Earl had been induced by means of a conspiracy to believe Edward II. still alive, appear on the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 4 Edward III., Nos. 11-12 (vol. ii. p. 55). The story of the Earl, the Friar, and the Spirit is given in a letter from Edward III. to the Pope, 'Roman Roll,' 4 Edward III., m. 5, the reference to which was found in the Hale MSS.

Commissions to enquire concerning maladministration and oppression are so numerous that it is unnecessary to give a catalogue of them. The great commission of 14 Edward III., relating to all officers, legal, military, naval, ecclesiastical, and financial, is enrolled on the Patent Roll, 14 Edward III., m. 8, d. See also the same roll, m. 3. The reference to this most important instrument was found in the Hale MSS. The Ordinance and Oath of the Justices are printed in the Statutes of the Realm (vol. i. pp. 303-306).

Pp. 226-227.
Records, &c.,
concerning the deposition and murder of Edward II.

Pp. 228-229.
Records
concerning the Earl, the Friar,
and the Spirit.

Pp. 229-231.
Records concerning corruption and attempts to check it.

CHAPTER IV.

Most of the incidents mentioned as being brought to the notice of a foreign traveller landing at Dover are described from evidence given in a later page of this chapter. The widow-pilgrim with her attendants is from Close Roll, 22 Edward III., part i. m. 29, d.

P. 232.
Evidence
concerning the scene at Dover.

In the various records which relate to criminal matters instances are frequent in which the offender takes sanctuary in a church, stays there a considerable time, is, no doubt, fed by sympathising friends, and at length confesses his crime before the coroner, who attends for the purpose of hearing his statement. The coroner, after the criminal has taken the oath of abjuration, assigns him a port, and gives him a definite number of days in which he is to reach it. The time allowed for travelling from Yorkshire to Dover is mentioned in a passage which is in other respects illustrative of the whole subject, and is to be found on the 'Placita Corone,' 22 Ed. III., County of York. A jury presents that one William of Coventry took sanctuary in the church of Thweng, and remained there from Sunday the 9th to Friday the 21st of December, when he confessed various robberies before the coroner, and abjured the realm. 'Et dati sunt ei novem dies usque portum de Dovoꝛ. ad transfretandum mare.' Other ports are of course mentioned sometimes, but Dover was certainly the chief place of embarkation for the Continent.

For the attack by the seamen of the Cinque Ports upon the ship sent as a present to Edward, son of Henry III., see Matt. Par., 'Hist.'

Pp. 233-234.
Records, &c.,
concerning the seamen of the Cinque Ports,
&c.

Major and Minor, anno 1254. Winchelsea was the port chiefly, if not wholly, concerned in the outrage. For subsequent piracies, see Close Roll, 11 Edw. II., m. 21, d. : 'De Discordiis inter Barones Quinque Portuum et Flandrenses reformandis,' which seems to show that the Cinque Port men had been acting without orders. See also Patent Roll, 15 Edw. III., pt. i. m. 44 : 'De Fœdere et amicitia inter Quinque Portus et Civitatem Baionæ.' These with many other documents, showing the prevalence of piracy, are printed in Rymer's 'Fœdera.'

It is hardly necessary to cite a number of passages for the purpose of showing that saddle-horses and pack-horses carried travellers and much of the merchandise of the fourteenth century. The carriage of the Chancery Rolls on horseback is mentioned on the Close Roll, 22 Ed. III., part ii. memb. 16, dors. The authority for the famine in Kent, which was at this time caused by the war (and which must have been chronic, like war itself), is the Close Roll, 22 Ed. III., part i. memb. 29, dors.

Pp. 234-235.
Records concerning a journey from Dover to London in the 14th century.

The description of a traveller's reception upon his arrival at a walled town in the evening is founded on the Statute of Winchester, which was confirmed in all points by the Statute of Northampton in the reign of Edward III., and was long afterwards enforced.

The sketch of Southwark and of the City of London is from the text of the 'Liber Albus' (Munimenta Gildhallæ Londoniensis), which has been edited for the Rolls Series by Mr. Riley, in whose Introduction all the most important points have been very clearly arranged. There seems to have been no important change in City crimes and City punishments from the time of Edward I. to that which is now under consideration.

Pp. 235-238.
Evidence concerning scenes in London.

The account of the lepers on the road from London to Westminster and the royal proclamation concerning them are from the Close Roll, 22 Ed. III., part i. memb. 25, dors.

Pp. 238-240.
Records concerning the road from London to Westminster, Westminster Abbey, and scenes there.

For the incident of waxing the body of Edward I. the authority is the Close Roll, 22 Ed. III., part i. memb. 19.

The state of the highway near Westminster Abbey is described in the Controlment Roll, King's Bench, 22 Ed. III., memb. 13, Middlesex. The 'Almorigate' was the Almonry Gate, afterwards still further corrupted into the Ambrygate, as mentioned by Stow.

The order for the repair of all bridges between Stratford and Hertford will be found on the Close Roll, 22 Ed. III., memb. 6, dors. It is so worded as to imply that they had not only become faulty, but had in some cases altogether disappeared. The sheriffs are to have as many bridges made as there used to be.

Pp. 240-242.
Records showing the state of the Roads, &c.

For instances of liability to repair bridges, &c., disputed by the clergy, reference may be made to the Controlment Roll (King's Bench), 22 Ed. III., memb. 16 and memb. 19, dors., which show that the Abbot of Fynsham refused to maintain the town bridge of Cambridge, then broken and in ruins, and memb. 17 and memb. 21, which show that the Abbot of Westminster refused to maintain Pershore Bridge. For the abundance of pools, fish-ponds, and other waters, see the Patent Roll of the year, passim.

A den of robbers on the highway is thus described in the 'Placita Corone,' 22 Ed. III.: 'Quidam latrones ignoti in campo de Denyngton, in quodam loco vocato le Covyng, qui est spelunca latronum in Regia Strata noctanter interfecerunt . . . et cum de bonis et catallis, &c., ad valenciam vi. s viii. d depredaverunt. Sed Juratores dicunt quod nulli de personis latronum habuerunt noticiam.' For ordinary robberies of merchants on the road, see also the Gaol Delivery Rolls, 22 Ed. III., Lynn, Aylesbury, &c.

P. 242.
Records concerning dens of robbers.

Acts of brigandage, or similar acts, are the subject of no inconsiderable portion of the Roll of Letters Patent of 22 Edward III.*

Pp. 242-245
Records
concerning brigandage,
the capture of Bristol, the want of respect for royal authority, &c.

Commissions of enquiry for almost every county are there enrolled, and usually contain a description of the offences committed. The injury done to the Abbot of Abingdon at the time of his fair is mentioned in part i. memb. 38, d. A favourite place of attack during fair-time was Boston. In the year 1288 a gang of robbers clad as monks set fire to the whole town, and committed murder and robbery as they pleased. It was said by the imaginative chroniclers that streams of molten gold flowed from the burning town to the sea. In the year before the Black Death there had apparently been a similar riot, for there is on the Patent Roll, 22 Edw. III., m. 8, a pardon to forty-three persons who had been guilty of assuming the royal power, confederacies, conspiracies, &c., at Boston. The offenders are described as men of Boston, but there were commonly traitors in the camp. A minor nocturnal disturbance at Yarmouth during market time appears on the Controlment Roll (King's Bench), memb. 76, Norfolk. The successful attack upon Bristol and its shipping is recorded partly in the Patent Roll, 22 Ed. III., part i. memb. 44, d., and partly in the Patent Roll, 21 Ed. III., part i. memb. 19, and part ii. memb. 28, d. The truth, however, of the general statements in the text is better established by the whole tenour of the various commissions of enquiry, &c., enrolled on the back of the three parts of the Patent Roll for the year, than even by the particular passages to which reference has been made.

The capture of a prisoner of war by a gang of robbers from the knights who were guarding him is the subject of an entry on the Patent Roll, 22 Edw. III., part i. memb. 43, d.; the taking of Queen Isabella's horses and wine, and the attack upon the ship of the envoy returning from Spain, appear on the same part, membrane 14, d. On the Patent Roll of the same year, but on the second part, membrane 37, d., is an account of the loss of the Black Prince's horses and carts, and on membrane 20, d., an account of the assault on 'Queen Philippa's Merchant,' of the burning of his house, and of the robbery of her jewels. The onslaught upon her collector of rents, the restitution of the £500 taken, and the consequent stay of proceedings, are recorded on the third part of the Patent Roll, membrane 37, d.

The murder of the King's Serjeant-at-Arms is described in the Controlment Roll, (K.B.), 22 Edward III. memb. 72, Ebor. Offences in the northern forests are also mentioned in the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III., part ii, memb. 29, d. The destitution of the king's tenants who were unable to pay their rents, and wandering about the country homeless, appears in the Close Roll, 22 Ed. III., memb. 5.

Pp. 245-246.
Records concerning the state of the Marches, &c.

The predatory band from Great Yarmouth, and the pardon to its leader and the whole of its members, are mentioned in the Patent Roll, 18 Edward III., part ii. memb. 36.

Pp. 246-253.
Records concerning the acts of private war, brigandage, &c., committed by the townsmen, knights, and clergy.

The removal of the timber from the Free Warren and Chace of the Countess of Lincoln, and the accusation against two abbots and a prior as leaders in the offence, are the subjects of a commission on the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III., part i. membrane 43, d. The pillage of a close belonging to the Archbishop of Canterbury by knights and chaplains is the subject of a commission on membrane 35, d. The illustrations given in the same paragraph are from the same Roll, part i. membranes 19, 13, 11, and 12, and part ii. membranes 36, 30, 28 (bis), 24, 23, and in every case from the back of the membranes. Any critic who wishes to verify the particular statements in the text, and to learn for himself that they are in accordance with the actual state of society, has only to consult the Roll at the Public Record Office. The back of any one of the parts will probably satisfy him.

An instance in which an attacking party broke a house open and carried off the title-deeds as well as timber, &c., is recorded on the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III., part iii. membrane 28, d. Many others might be mentioned.

The case of forcible entry in Worcestershire is from the same Roll and part, membrane 31, d. The forcible entry on a manor of the Bishop of Exeter, which was mistaken for a foreign invasion in force, is described on the same Roll, part ii, memb. 26, d. The forcible entry in Wiltshire, followed by murder, rape, and brigandage, appears on the same Roll, part iii, memb. 15, and on the Controlment Roll, m. 2, d., Wilts; m. 12, d., Lancashire; and m. 28, Wilts. The account of Ercedecne, knight and outlaw, is from the Patent Roll, part i., membranes 41, d., and 30, d., and part ii., membrane 42, d. Part iii., membrane 26, d., contains the commission of enquiry concerning the engagement between the Under-sheriff of Cambridgeshire with an escort, and another armed force at Cambridge; membranes 13 and 20, d., the commission concerning the attack upon the cemetery, cathedral, and priory of Worcester by the 'duo ballivi dicte ville Wygornie, et communitas dicte ville.'

The total of murders (i.e. of persons feloniously slain) in Yorkshire, either by one person or at any rate not by a gang of brigands, has been ascertained from the 'Coroners' Rolls,' which are mm. 39 to 56, d. of the Controlment Roll. The numbers appearing in the Rolls of the various coroners cannot, when added together, be made less than 88 for the year 22 Edward III. The numbers, however, from year's end, to year's end must have been considerably greater, as some of the lists (e. g. that for the North Riding) obviously extend over only a part of the year. These rolls contain lists of felonious homicides for earlier years, which fully confirm the inferences drawn from the year 22 Edward III. alone. The Coroners' Rolls exist, in part only, in duplicate in the Assise Series, but are not equally complete for any other county. The best authority for the population of England shortly after the Black Death is the Subsidy Roll, 51 Edward III. It has been printed in the 'Archæologia,' vol. vii. pp. 337-347. The persons taxed were those above fourteen years of age, and the total population has been found by calculation. See McPherson, 'History of Commerce,' sub anno. The total is not, of course, absolutely correct, but cannot be very far from the truth. The evidence for 'Verdicts of Murder on Coroners' Inquests,' from 1860 to 1869, is the Parliamentary Paper No. 109, Session 1871. (Mr. Lambton). This does not include verdicts of manslaughter, but does include cases of infanticide, and may very fairly be compared with the Roll of 1348.

It is well known that estre was a feminine affix before the Low German dialects in England began to lose their grammatical vitality--that 'webbestre' was a female weaver, and 'bæcestre' a female baker. In the Controlment Roll, however, of 22 Edward III., m. 34, Lincoln, two men are described as websters, and distinction of sex could not, therefore, have been at that time indicated by the old termination. It has already been mentioned that the punishment for a female brewer of bad ale in Chester appears among the customs recorded in Domesday Book. The 'Munimenta Gildhallæ Londoniensis' do not show that women were occupied in London in baking and brewing at the period now under consideration, but the Statute 37 Edward III., c. 6, shows that there were still female brewers and bakers in England. The case in which a woman strangled her husband and placed the dead body in an oven is from 'Placita Corone,' Derbyshire, M. 34, in the Public Record Office. A somewhat similar case will be found on the Gaol Delivery Roll, Town of Great Yarmouth, Friday after the Feast of St. Margaret. For instances in which women took part in the riotous doings of the time a general reference to the back of the Patent Roll will suffice.

The words in which the common obstruction of the justices by

Pp. 253-255.
Records concerning the proportion of homicides to population in 1348.

Pp. 255-256.
Records concerning the character and position of women in 1348.

armed bands is described, will be found on the Patent Roll, 22 Ed. III., part i. membrane 32, dors., and elsewhere. The attack upon the Mayor in the presence of the sitting justices, at Cambridge, is related upon the authority of the Gaol Delivery Roll, 22 Edward III., Cambridge Castle, Michaelmas. The imprisonment of the sheriff's retainers by the trades-men or working men of York appears on the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III., part ii, membrane 23, dors. The riot and the use of swords and knives in the presence of the Justices of Assise at Somerton are recorded in the Controlment Roll (King's Bench), 22 Edward III., membrane 2, Somerset.

Pp. 256-257.
Records concerning attacks upon justices, and brawls in Court.

The cases of intimidation of indictors and appellors have been selected from the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III., part ii. membrane 33, dors., and part iii. membrane 32, dors.

Resistance to the king's officers in the collection of tenths, &c., and rescue from bailiffs after distraint, are the subjects of commissions on the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III., part i. membranes 32, 31, 28, 18, 14; part ii. membrane 2; part iii. membrane 36, and especially membrane 38. These matters will be found, in each case, on the back of the membrane.

Pp. 257-259.
Records concerning intimidation of suitors, resistance to tax-collectors, &c.

The case in which burglary and the threat of rape are employed to force a woman to promise marriage will be found on the Controlment Roll (King's Bench), 22 Edward III., m. 4, Somerset. An instance of abduction occurs on the same Roll, mm. 27, and 29. The Statute forbidding the forcible marriage of women against their will is 3 Henry VII., c. 2 [iii].

Pp. 260-261.
Records concerning forcible marriage and abduction.

The frauds committed by the Keeper or Master of the Horse (Custos Equicii et Magnorum equorum) and his subordinates, appear on the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III., part i. m. 3, dors., and part ii. m. 5, dors. Instances of corruption, and complaints against the king's collectors of taxes, escheators, and other ministers, may be seen on the Patent Roll, part ii. m. 10, d., and part iii. m. 25, d., and 26, d., on the Close Roll, part ii., m. 16, and on the Controlment Roll, m. 63, d., Yorkshire. An instance of a 'chivaler' shipping a cargo of wool and evading the duty will be found on the same Roll, part ii. m. 33, d.; the complaint of the merchants that their money was taken, and the convoy for which it was given not supplied, on part i. m. 15, d.

Pp. 261-262.
Records concerning peculation by the Master of the Horse and other knights.

For instances in which the French, when at war with the English, were supplied with provisions from England, see the Patent Roll, part ii. m. 26, d.; for the supply of food and arms to the Scots when at war with the English, see the Controlment Roll, m. 38, Somerset, and m. 17, d., on which membrane will also be found (Sussex) the case of the Arrayer of Archers, who embezzled the sums levied in the king's name.

Pp. 264-265.
Records concerning the treachery of merchants and knights.

There are five commissions to enquire concerning merchants who defrauded the king of his export dues, on the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III.,

Pp. 265-267.
Records concerning evasion of duties, the importation of false coin, and the manufacture of it in England.

part i. m. 43, d., and others on part ii. m. 30, d., and part iii. m. 30, d. The same subject is illustrated by the Controlment Roll (King's Bench), 22 Edward III., m. 23, Northumberland. An instance of evading customs by false declaration of port appears on the Patent Roll, 22

Edward III., part i. m. 31, d.; an instance of collusion with the collectors, on the Close Roll of the same year, part i. m. 21. The commissions to discover who had exported good and imported bad money are in the same form for the various counties, and it may suffice to refer to one (for the county of Gloucester) on the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III., part ii. m. 21, d.

There were successive debasements of the coinage by royal authority in the years 1300, 1344, and 1346. The effect is made apparent in an Appendix to McPherson's 'History of Commerce.'

In the Gaol Delivery Roll, 22 Edward III., Aylesbury, Trin., two coiners are mentioned. The manufacture of false plate and coin at Scarborough is described in the Controlment Roll of the same year, m. 67, Yorkshire. It also appears on m. 12, London, that a coiner was sent to the Tower before his trial. A case of unlawful possession of false money by four persons will be found on the same Roll, m. 34, Suffolk.

Pp. 267-268.
Record concerning false accusation of importing base coin.

The case of false accusation made by the Examiner of the port of Hull as a pretext for seizing good coin appears on the Controlment Roll, m. 66, Yorkshire.

P. 268.
Record concerning the Mints.

The case of the Lombard merchants who entrusted silver to a mint-master to be coined, and could not recover it, is the subject of a commission on the Patent Roll, part i. m. 5, d.

Accusations of counterfeiting letters and seals may be seen in the Gaol Delivery Roll, 22 Edward III., Bedford, Michaelmas, and

Pp. 269-270.
Records concerning counterfeit seals, forged letters, writs, returns, &c.

Aylesbury, Trinity. A form of enquiry concerning the misdeeds of purveyors, and persons falsely representing themselves to be purveyors, occurs on the Patent Roll of the same year, part i. m. 16, d. The case of personation of the Lord Chancellor's kinsman and purveyor, is taken from the Controlment Roll, m. 37, Middlesex.

Forgery as applied to writs, counterfeit seals attached to them, and the losses incurred by the Bishop of Exeter and others from sham legal proceedings, are the subjects of a commission on the Patent Roll, part i. m. 17, d.

Pp. 271-272.
Record concerning forgery as an aid to brigandage.

The doings of the Suffolk gang, which united the ordinary acts of brigandage with counterfeiting, forgery, and other crimes of the kind generally considered more ignoble than crimes of violence, are recorded on the Controlment Roll, m. 14, Suffolk.

On the same Roll, m. 8, Norfolk, is the case in which a man was brought to trial for forging Letters Patent of pardon. P. 272.
Record concerning forged pardons.

The commission to enquire into corruption at the Exchequer, payments without warrant, counterfeit seals, and false bills, is enrolled on the Patent Roll, part i. m. 35, d. The writ to the Treasurer and Barons of the Exchequer respecting an extension of time to merchants who were afraid of presenting false bills purporting to have issued from the Wardrobe, is on the Close Roll, part ii. m. 8, d. The case in which a 'king's minister' is convicted of forging bills on the Wardrobe to the amount of more than 6000*l.* of ancient money, appears on the Controlment Roll, m. 24, London. Pp. 273-274.
Records concerning the forgery of Exchequer Bills.

Particulars of the falsification of a charter in the monastery of Bruerne are given on the Close Roll, 42 Edward III., m. 8, d., the reference to which is given in the Hale MSS. The extent to which forgery of this kind was practised may be inferred from an inspection of the charters in Kemble's 'Codex Diplomaticus,' to which the mark of spuriousness has been most freely, though by no means too freely, attached. Pp. 275-276.
Evidence concerning the forgeries of Charters.

Falsification of a writ while in the hands of the Sheriff of Norfolk is the subject of a case recorded on the Controlment Roll, 22 Edward III., m. 3, Norfolk. Pp. 276-279.
Records concerning forgery by sheriffs, packing of juries, &c.

The instance in which the Court of King's Bench held that the Sheriff of Hampshire had sent an insufficient return to a writ, for the purpose of shielding a person accused of homicide, appears on the same roll, m. 81, d., Suth^t.

The refusal of the Sheriff of Hampshire to execute the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, and the attempt of the coroners to support him, appear on the same roll, m. 31, Suth^t.

Packing a jury is a charge brought against the Sheriff of Sussex, and established, according to Controlment Roll, m. 34, Sussex. On m. 22, Suffolk, is a record of an inquisition annulled because the Sheriff had placed outlaws upon the jury.

An instance in which accused persons were to be tried at the Gaol Delivery of Newgate, because they were too powerful in their own district, appears on the Gaol Delivery Roll, 25 Edward III., Huntingdon, where there is a writ to that effect, directed to the Sheriff of Cambridge.

The accusation of bribery against the Chief Clerk of the King's Bench, and the subsequent threat of violence, are recorded on the

Pp. 279-280.
Records showing corruption in the Court of King's Bench.

Controlment Roll, 22 Edward III., m. 29, d., Middlesex. The commission to enquire into misdeeds in the Court of King's Bench is enrolled on the Patent Roll of the same year, part iii. m. 28, d.

Pp. 280-281.
Record concerning forgery and double-dealing by Counsel.

On the Controlment Roll of this year, m. 21, Middlesex, are the curious prosecution and conviction of a counsel for taking fees from both parties to a suit, and for being concerned in the forgery of a panel of jurors.

Pp. 281-282.
Record concerning an Archdeacon's Court.

The conspiracy by which a man was excommunicated without notice, in the Archdeacon's Court in London, is recorded on m. 20 of the Controlment Roll, Middlesex.

The paragraph in the text which relates to the corruption of Chief Justice Thorpe is founded on the following authorities:—

Pp. 282-284.
Records concerning the acceptance of bribes by Chief Justice
Thorpe, &c.

The ordinance for the Justices, and the oath exacted from them on appointment, as printed in the Statutes of the Realm, anno 20 Edw. III.; the exemplification of process, sentence, and stay of execution, against Thorpe, enrolled on the Patent Roll, 24 Edward III., part iii. m. 3, d. (printed in Rymer's 'Fœdera,' Record Commission Edition, vol. iii., part i., pp. 208-210), and referred to in the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 25 Edward III. (vol. ii., p. 227); the pardon and restitution of lands on the Patent Roll, 25 Edward III., part i. m. 17. References to this subject were first collected in the Hale MSS., partly, as it seems, from an old calendar of the Patent Rolls since published.

Instances in which corn, timber, and hay were carried off without interference on the part of the local authorities may be seen in abundance on the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III. It may suffice to refer to part ii., m. 2, d., and part iii. mm. 16, d., 22 d., 32 d., 35 d.

The statement in the text that criminals, even when brought to trial, were but rarely convicted, is justified by reference to as many of the

Pp. 284-285.
Records showing the reluctance of jurors to convict.

Gaol Delivery Rolls of the 22nd year of the reign of Edward III. as have been preserved. They include the Deliveries of the Gaols of Norwich Castle, Bury St. Edmunds, Cambridge Castle, Huntingdon, Bedford, Aylesbury, East Dereham, Great Yarmouth, Bishop's Lynn, Eye, Ipswich, Melton, Worcester Castle, Gloucester Castle, Old Sarum Castle, Old Sarum, and Winchester. Out of 337 persons accused (except clerks, of whom more hereafter) only 83 were convicted. Instances in which persons found in suspicious possession of goods were remanded by the judges for an Inquest of Fame, and afterwards declared to be of good repute, may be seen in the Gaol Deliveries of Cambridge, Easter Term, of Aylesbury, Trinity Term, of Melton, Easter Term, etc., etc.

For instances in which men and women are described as 'Common Receivers' of felons and stolen goods, it is sufficient to refer to the Gaol Delivery Rolls, passim. Similar instances may also be found on the Controlment Roll, as well as notices of 'common peace-breakers,' common 'latrones,' common 'malefactores.'

Pp. 285-286.
Records concerning receivers.

The statement that persons accused by approvers were almost always acquitted, and the approver almost always hanged, is founded on the Gaol Delivery Rolls, to which reference has already been made.

Pp. 286-289.
Records concerning approvers, and appeals by them.

The commission of enquiry concerning tortures at Newgate, extortion of money, and appeals instituted by prisoners forced by duress to become approvers, appears on the Patent Roll 7 Edward III., part i., m. 22, d. A reference to this was found in the Hale MSS. Deaths of approvers in prison are frequently mentioned in the Gaol Delivery Rolls, and the deaths of fifty in the prison of York Castle are mentioned in the Controlment Roll, 22 Edward III., mm. 59 to 61, d., inclusive.

The approver who accepted the wager of battle, withdrew his charge, and was hanged, appears in a case in the Gaol Delivery Roll, 22 Edward III., 'Trinity Term, Aylesbury.

Common appeals, other than by approvers, are to be seen in such numbers on the Controlment Roll that it is unnecessary to give more than that general reference. The particular instance to which attention has been drawn in the text occurs on m. 36, Suffolk.

Pp. 289-292.
Records concerning other appeals.

A writ to apprehend the Keeper of the Marshalsea Prison for permitting the escape of prisoners is enrolled on the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III., part i., m. 37, d. Instances of gaol-breaking, and cases in which the accused were sent back to prison untried, 'pro defectu patrie,' may be found on the Gaol Delivery and Controlment Rolls, passim.

P. 292.
Records concerning the escape of criminals by gaol-breaking and collusion.

The two first instances adduced in illustration of the difficulty of identifying a prisoner by his name are from the Chancery Roll 'A,' of Thomas Hatfield, Bishop of Durham, of which a calendar, by the author of the present work, is printed in the 31st Report of the Deputy Keeper of Public Records. See p. 143 'Litster William,' and p. 155 'Robertservant, Nicholas, of the Woghes.' Of the other instances, the first two are from the Controlment Roll, m. 1, the third from the same roll, m. 12, Kent. For numerous similar cases reference may be made to the Controlment Roll, passim; but see especially m. 22, Suffolk, m. 27, Norfolk, m. 34, Lincoln, m. 83, d., Yorkshire. The Statutes which relate to this matter are 37 Edward III., c. 2, 'De

Pp. 293-294.
Evidence concerning difficulty of identification of name.

Idemptitate Nominis,' 1 Henry V., c. 5 (the Statute of Additions), and 9 Henry VI., c. 4.

Among the genuine instances of pardon for service in war may be mentioned one to a 'communis latro' on the Controlment Roll, m. 72, d., Lincoln, and m. 84, Yorkshire. Pardons granted at the request of men who had influence with the king appear on m. 83, d., Yorkshire, and (to one of the actors in the affair related at pp. 250-251), on m. 3, d., Wiltshire. The detection of John Mast in the offence of obtaining a pardon for a brother by personating him at the battle of Crécy is recorded on m. 65, d., Yorkshire. Proceedings in Parliament relating to the evils brought about by the facility with which pardons could be obtained will be found in the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum' for the reign of Edward III., passim. (Printed vol. ii. See especially pp. 161, 167, 171, 172, annis 20 and 21 Edward III.). Instances in which the accused are detained in prison without trial until a year and a day have passed are common on the Rolls of Gaol Delivery. See, e.g., the Roll 22 Edward III., Bedford, Trinity.

The pardon for burial of a body in a false name, during the life of the person represented to be dead, and the particulars given in the text, are found on the Controlment Roll, m. 17, d., Norfolk, and on the Patent Roll, part iii. m. 35.

Instances in which Benefit of Clergy is claimed may be seen in abundance on the Rolls of Gaol Delivery in the Public Record Office, which illustrate the mode of proceeding better than any other documents. It is perhaps hardly necessary to give particular references, but a case in which a clerk was given up to the Ordinary before trial occurs in the Gaol Delivery of Bury St. Edmund's, 22 Edward III., Easter, where also are cases in which clerks are given up as convicts. By Statute 3 of 18 Edward III., c. 2, the decision whether a person claiming clergy was disqualified by bigamy was declared to be within the ecclesiastical jurisdiction; but at the Gaol Delivery of Old Sarum Castle (Monday after the Feast of St. Matthew the Apostle) the right was waived by the Ordinary, and a jury gave a verdict upon the point. The Ordinary probably had reasons for not wishing to save the accused, who was hanged as a receiver of felons. A case in which a trial by jury was held after clergy had been claimed, in order that it might be known in what character the clerk was to be given up, may be seen in the Gaol Delivery of Gloucester Castle (Wednesday after the Nativity of the Virgin). Compurgation was recognised by the canon law as a ceremony through which a clerk should pass after delivery to the Ordinary. The abuses to which it led are faintly indicated in the promise of the Archbishop of

Pp. 294-297.
Records concerning pardons, false and genuine.

Pp. 297-302.
Note and references to records concerning Benefit of Clergy, the manner of claiming it, and its effects.

Canterbury, that, in future, clerks convict should receive a fitting punishment. This is recited in Statute 6 of 25 Edward III., which relates to benefit of clergy, and which, in referring to extortions by Ordinaries (c. 4), indicates that compurgation was to some extent at least a matter of purchase.

The paragraph in the text which relates to the definition of a clerk, and the classes protected by Benefit of Clergy, is founded on the following evidence:—The Statute of Bigamy, 4 Edward I., c. 5, which deprives the bigamist (in the ecclesiastical sense) of his clergy; the ‘Liber Assisarum,’ 26 Edward III., p. 122, in the series of Year Books, in which it appears that the tonsure was held to be essential for privilege of clergy, by Justice Shard at the Gaol Delivery of Newgate; the same book, p. 138, where the judges are instructed (Article 11) to enquire what gaolers had aided their prisoners to learn letters; and the Year Book for 34 Henry VI., p. 49, a. b., which shows that at the later period the judges could insist on knowledge of letters being held sufficient, though they were somewhat doubtful, for a time, of their own power against the Bishop’s deputy.

Sir Matthew Hale discovered the curious case in which the son of a ‘clerk’ convicted of felony was declared his father’s heir, though the father died without purgation. There is a short reference to it in the Hale MSS. The document is in the Public Record Office, and its description is ‘Inquisitions post mortem, Chancery, 13 Edward III., Southampton, Johannes de Valoignes.’ The expression in it ‘quatenus clericus convinci potuit convictus’ is well worthy of remark.

For the invariable conviction of clerks, when accused in secular courts, of the offences with which they were charged, and for their escape when they became approvers, it is sufficient to refer to the Gaol Delivery Rolls of the year, passim.

Pp. 302-304.
Records concerning the conviction of clerks, and the popularity of the clergy.

For instances of burglary at parsonages and churches, see the Gaol Delivery Rolls of the year, passim—especially those of Bury St. Edmunds and Melton, and the Patent Roll, Part i. m. 41, d. See also the Gaol Delivery Rolls, passim, for instances in which persons described as common receivers are also described as clerks; for an instance in which a vicar was accused of receiving a box of jewels taken from two murdered merchants, see Aylesbury, Trinity Term. The Controlment Roll, m. 62, Southampton, shows that another vicar was outlawed after having received certain offenders. The offence of obtaining papal provisions was first mentioned in a Statute in 35 Edward I. Upon this apparently were founded all the later Statutes of Premunire. The matter excited great commotion during the whole reign of Edward III. It is only necessary to refer to the Patent Roll, 22 Edward III., passim, for instructions concerning those who usurped the king's privileges, and denied the authority of his laws, and those who introduced into the realm 'bullas et instrumenta prejudicialia.' See, however, especially part ii. m. 41, d., where each offence is mentioned in a separate instrument. Cases in which the offenders had to answer in the Court of King's Bench will be found on the Controlment Roll, m. 15, d., Devon, m. 27, d., London, &c. On the Close Roll, part ii. m. 2, d., may be seen the form of oath in which the Archbishop elect of Canterbury had to renounce all those words in papal bulls which might be to the prejudice of the king with respect to the temporalities of the See.

Cases in which forcible entry was made into rectories and prebends

P. 304.
Records concerning forcible entries upon Rectories, &c.

both by clerks and by laymen are recorded on the Controlment Roll, m. 6, London, &c., and on the Patent Roll, part ii. mm. 24, d., 19 d., &c., and part iii. m. 16, and the forcible collection of tithes, on the Patent Roll, part ii. m. 7, d.

P. 305.
Record concerning the excommunication of sheriff's officers.

The excommunication of the Under-sheriff and the Sheriff's men by the Bishop of Exeter, because they had seized his cattle in execution, is mentioned in the Controlment Roll, m. 6, d., Devon.

Mismanagement of charities by religious persons—the diversion of land and revenues from the charitable purposes for which they had been given—is the subject of complaint in instruments on the Patent Roll, part ii. m. 4, d., and part iii. m. 24, d. A recommendation by the Commons that the Alien Priors should be taken into the king's hand appears on the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' vol. ii. (p. 162), as early as the 20th year of the reign of Edward III. Their final suppression, with the absorption of their lands by the Crown under Henry V., was the precedent according to which monasteries were dissolved in the reign of Henry VIII., and affords a valuable indication of the temper of the people, with respect to religion, during successive generations.

Pp. 305-306.
Records concerning mismanagement of charities, &c.

Instances of homicide by parsons of churches will be found, in the

P. 307.
Records concerning homicide, &c., by parsons.

same order as in the text, on the Controlment Roll, m. 81, Salop; m. 77, Leicestershire; m. 27, d., Wiltshire; and m. 21, d., Suffolk; by a Prior and monk, m. 5, d., Warwickshire; and many of the same character elsewhere. The case of the parson of Trent is from m. 2, Somerset.

Writs for the arrest of apostate monks will be found on the Patent Roll, part ii. m. 44, d., and part iii. m. 23, d. The deeds of the robber-monks of Ramsey Abbey are recorded on the Controlment Roll, m. 7, Hunts; m. 19, Hunts; and m. 67, Yorkshire. Similar cases were by no means uncommon; see the Gaol Delivery Roll, Bury St. Edmunds, Friday after the Feast of St. Matthew

P. 308.
Records concerning fugitive monks.

the Apostle, for an instance in which two clerks were convicted of church-breaking.

The case of sacrilege at Scarborough is recorded on the Controlment Roll, m. 65, d., Yorkshire. For another case, see Gaol Delivery Roll, Melton, Easter.

P. 309.
Records concerning sacrilege.

The lines quoted from Chaucer in illustration of the manners of the clergy are from the well-known prologue to the 'Canterbury Tales.'

Pp. 309-312.
Chaucer and the 'Vision.'

The lines from the 'Vision of Piers Plowman' are within a few of the beginning of the work. The language has been so far modernised in the text as to make it generally intelligible.

The assertions made (in illustration of the state of education) with respect to the languages in which the Year Books or Legal Reports of Cases, the Treatises on Law, and the Public Records were written, are founded on actual inspection of the documents mentioned. The Statute which provides that pleadings shall be in English is 36 Edward III., c. 15. The Statute by which the distinction between Norman and Englishman was abolished, in the abolition of the Presentment of Englishry, is 14 Edward III., Stat. i. c. 4. The proclamation in English, of the reign of Henry III., is enrolled on the Patent Roll, 43 Henry III., m. 15; the proclamation in French, of which it is a translation, on the Patent Roll, 42 Henry III., m. 1.

Pp. 312-316.
Records, &c., concerning the state of education in the 14th century.

French of the school of Stratford-atte-Bow is mentioned, as spoken by the Prioress, in the prologue to the 'Canterbury Tales.' The inability of the common people to understand any language but English is established by the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 21 Edward III., No. 64 (vol. ii. p. 173), as well as by the statute 36 Edward III., c. 15.

The account of the Black Death and of its immediate effects is principally from the 'Chronicle of Knighton,' sub ann. This is confirmed by the absence of certain records belonging to an otherwise continuous series. Mr. Secbohm has found additional evidence in the records of institutions to livings after the plague, and has given the proportion of deaths among parsons in the 'Fortnightly Review,' vol. ii. p. 149. To him also is due the credit of being the first to point out the great importance of this plague in the social history of England.

Pp. 316-321.
Note and evidence concerning the Black Death and its importance.

NOTE.—Wherever, in the references to Chapter IV., a roll is mentioned without date, it is to be understood that the 22nd of Edward III. is the year to which the roll belongs.

CHAPTER. V.

THE Statute of Labourers is the title usually given to the Statute i. of 23 Edward III., cc. 1-4, by which also innkeepers and dealers in provisions are required to sell their goods at prices fixed in the Act.

P. 323.
The Statute of Labourers.

Pp. 324-327.
Evidence for the history of slavery and villanage: a deed of sale in full.

The authorities for the condition of slaves and churls before the Norman Conquest are given in Chapter I. (References and Notes, pp. 437-438, 445).

In Domesday Book 'servi' and 'villani' are mentioned, passim.

Exportation of slaves is forbidden in the 'Laws of the Conqueror,' iii., 15, to which reference has already been made (C. I.).

Deeds relating to the sale of villeins may be seen in Madox's 'Formulare Anglicanum,' Nos. 314, 315, 399, 410, 556, 756, 757-762. Subjoined is a specimen (with full details) from another source:—

(Extended according to the contemporaneous spelling.)

Miscellanea, Duchy of Lancaster, London, 825. Public Record Office.

[Endorsed.]

Carta Galfridi de Scalariis de Johanne filio Roberti nativo suo empto apud Corneye.

'Sciunt presentes et futuri quod Ego Galfridus de Scalariis filius Hugonis dedi et concessi et quieteclamavi et presenti carta confirmavi Deo et Ecclesie Sancte Trinitatis, Londonie, et Ricardo Priori et Canonicis ibidem Deo servientibus, Johannem filium Roberti de Wydyhale, nativum meum, cum tota sequela sua, que de eo exiit, vel exhibit, in perpetuum, cum omnibus catallis eorum, que habent vel habituri sunt—scilicet quicquid juris in dictis Johanne, et tota sequela sua, et catallis eorum, habui, vel habere potui, sine aliquo retenemento—Habendum dictis Priori et Canonicis et eorum successoribus, extra me et heredibus meis in perpetuum. Pro hac autem donatione, concessione, quietaclamatione, et presentis carte confirmatione, memorati Prior et Canonici dederunt mihi Galfrido sex marcas argenti. Hiis testibus,' etc.

The value of the 'nativus' varied probably with the number of his 'sequela.' A man without any family was sometimes not worth more than a pound.

In the 'Formulare' (Nos. 750, 751, 752) are deeds of enfranchisement anterior to the Conquest. The commission to receive fines for manumission from the king's villeins (Ed. III.) is printed in Rymer's 'Fœdera,' Record Com. Edn., vol. ii., pt. ii., p. 1038, from the Patent Roll, 12 Edward III., part ii., m. 29. Instances in which 'nativi' were manumitted upon payment of money to other lords are given in the 'Formulare' (Nos. 754 and 755).

Pp. 327-329.
Records showing the beginning of free labour.

The Statute of Labourers was re-enacted, with little alteration, in 25 Edward III., and subsequently, and commissions to enforce it and to punish those who violated it are of frequent occurrence on the later Patent Rolls. In the end it became usual to mention the Statute in the commissions to Justices of the Peace.

It appears by the Close Roll, 35 Edward III., m. 30, and m. 21, printed in Rymer's 'Fœdera' (Rec. Com. Edn.), vol. iii. pp. 616 and 621, that there was a return of the plague in the year 1361.

For the doctrine of equality taught by the unorthodox preachers of the period, see Froissart, ii., 73, and Walsingham, 'Hist. Angl.,' vol. ii., pp. 32-34 (M.R. Series). For the Apostate Monks, see Chapter IV. of the present work, pp. 308, 484.

P. 329.
Doctrine of equality: unorthodox preachers.

For the claim of the villeins to freedom, asserted on the faith of transcripts from Domesday Book, see the Statute 1 Richard II., c. 6, which was repealed by 2 Richard II., Stat. ii., c. 2.

Pp. 329-331.
Records illustrating the claim of the villeins to be free.

The case in which the condition of a recognisance (made in the time of Henry VI.) was that the collector of the Bishop of Durham should become a 'nativus' if he failed to pay his arrears, occurs on the Cursitor's Roll, No. 4 [BB.] of Bishop Neville [Public Record Office], memb. 12, d.

The outline of Wat Tyler's rebellion is from Knighton ('Decem Scriptores'), 2633 et seq., and from Walsingham's 'Historia Anglicana' (M.R. Series, Ed. Riley), vol. i., p. 453 et seq., and vol. ii., pp. 1-34. The connection of the movement with ecclesiastical questions is made sufficiently clear by the release of John Ball from the Archbishop's prison, and by a reference to Piers Plowman in the words attributed to Jack Carter, one of the leaders, by Knighton. The subsequent petition of landholders, incidentally mentioned, that no villein should be taught to read, appears on the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 15 Ric. II., No. 39 (printed

Pp. 331-337.
Evidence of Records, Chronicles, Songs, &c., for the details of Wat Tyler's Rebellion.

vol. iii., p. 294). The particulars relating to the Duke of Lancaster are from the Patent Roll, 6 Ric. II., part ii. m. 6 : Pardon of John Cote. The reference to this passage was found in the Hale MSS. The particulars relating to Richard Lyons are from the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 50 Edward III., Nos. 17 and 31 (printed vol. ii., pp. 323-4 and 327). The restitution of his goods through the alleged influence of Alice Perers, is mentioned in the 'R. P.,' Richard II., No. 41 (printed vol. iii., p. 12). Some of the details of Sudbury's death, together with a lament on the want of heart shown by the gentlemen on this occasion, are to be found in a song of the period, published in the M.R. Series ('Political Poems, &c.,' Ed. Wright), vol. i., pp. 227-230. The bitter animosity between the Lollards or Wyclifites and the orthodox clergy is well illustrated by other poems in the same volume—some written on one side, and some on the other. See pp. 231-250, 263-268, &c. The general coarseness of the age appears here as elsewhere.

The word impeachment has assumed a restricted and technical signification only in later times. William of Wykeham was 'impetitus,' as an ordinary criminal might have been in his day for an ordinary offence before an inferior tribunal. The charges brought against him, and the subsequent transactions, are recorded in the Patent Roll, 1 Richard II., part i., mm. 23 and 24. There is an 'Inspeximus' of the same documents in part ii., mm. 1 and 2, where it is stated that the pardon was confirmed with the unanimous consent of the Great Council. The references to those documents were found in the Hale MSS. Similar charges against the Bishop of Norwich, who was condemned, appear in 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 7 Richard II., No. 15 (Printed vol. iii., p. 152.) An inspection of these Rolls of Parliament will suffice to convince anyone that accusations and counter-accusations, attainders and reversals of attainder, were the ordinary events of public life at the period.

The general pardon of felonies, granted in the fiftieth year of the reign of Edward III., with the express declaration that William of Wykeham 'should nothing enjoy of the said graces,' appears among the Statutes of the Realm, 50 Ed. III., c. 3 (Vol. i., p. 397).

The diversion of tithes from one of their proper objects—the support of the poor—is mentioned in the Statute 15 Richard II., c. 6, by which it is enacted that in future no licence for Appropriation shall be given except when a fitting sum has been set aside to be distributed yearly among the poor, and when a fitting provision has been made for the Vicar. The Statute of 1388, concerning beggars and vagrants, is known as 12 Richard II., c. 7.

Pp. 338-340.
Note on 'Impeachment.'
Records concerning the charges against William of Wykeham, the Bishop of Norwich, &c.

Pp. 340-342.
References
concerning Appropriations, misapplication of tithes, and general dissatisfaction with
the clergy.

Among the political songs and poems of the period, to which reference is made in the text, may be mentioned: 'The Complaint of the Ploughman,' Ed. Wright, M.R. Series, vol i., pp. 324-346, and the three pieces which follow it, pp. 346-362, 'The Corruptions of the Age,' 'On the Vices of the different Orders of Society,' and 'On King Richard II.' See also vol. ii., pp. 1-114, the Complaint of 'Jacke Upland,' a Lollard, the Reply of Friar Daw, and the Rejoinder of Jacke. In the last appears the charge, made against the friars, of kidnapping children, which is the subject of complaint and redress in the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 4 Henry IV., No. 62 (vol. iii., p. 502).

The suggestion of the Commons that the money required by the king should be taken from the alien priories appears in the 'Rot. Parl.,' 4 Henry IV., No. 48 (vol. iii., p. 499), as well as earlier. P. 347. Statute, &c., showing the policy of Henry IV. and Henry V. There was an ordinance against them in 13 Ric. II., and they were finally suppressed by the Statute 1 Hen. V., c. 7. An important Statute against papal provisions was 2 Hen. IV., c. 3. The petition of the Commons that in cases of appropriation a secular vicar should be appointed, and the king's consent, appear on the 'Rot. Parl.,' 2 Hen. IV., No. 52 (vol. iii., pp. 499-500).

It is laid down in the later law-books that the writ 'de heretico comburendo' existed at the common law before the Statute 2 Henry IV., c. 15, gave authority to the sheriff to burn heretics without a special writ; and this opinion is to a certain extent confirmed by Bracton, &c. See Hale, 'Historia Placitorum Coronæ,' vol. i., pp. 383-395; Coke, 'Instit.,' part iii., pp. 39-43. Both Hale ('P. C.,' vol. i., p. 397) and Fox ('Acts and Monuments,' i., 773) discuss the question whether the Statute had the assent of the Commons, Hale taking one side, Fox the other. Bacon, in the concluding paragraph of 'A Preparation for the Union of Laws,' denies the existence of any Statute for the burning of heretics, but admits the king's writ 'de heretico comburendo' as part of the common law. It seems, however, difficult to explain away the thanks offered by the Commons to the king at the end of the session for the remedy ordained in destruction of the heretical doctrines and sects, 'Rot. Parl.,' 2 Hen. IV., No. 47 (Printed vol. iii., p. 466). Pp. 343-344. References concerning the writ and statute for burning heretics.

The writ for the execution of Sautre, dated before the passing of the General Act for the punishment of heretics, appears on the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 2 Henry IV., No. 29 (vol. iii., p. 459). It issued by authority of the king and council in Parliament. Pp. 344-346. Records concerning the execution of Sautre, and the persecution of other Lollards.

Writs 'De Lolardis arestandis' in the various counties will be found on the Patent Roll, 9 Henry IV., part i. and 10 Henry IV., part i., and probably also elsewhere. An execution by fire, possibly that of John Badby, is mentioned in the 'Eulogium Historiarum sive Temporis,' a contemporary chronicle (Ed. Haydon, M.R. series), vol. iii., pp. 416-417. The writ for Badby's execution is in the 'Fœdera,' Original Edition, vol. viii., p. 627, from the Close Roll, 11 Henry IV., m. 18.

The documents which relate the sentence upon Oldcastle are the indictment on the 'Coram Rege' Roll (King's Bench, Crown Side), 1 Henry V., Hilary, Rex, Ro. 7, the outlawry of Oldcastle and many others, on the same Roll, Ro. 13, and the Proceedings in Parliament, 5 Henry V. The Proceedings in Parliament are printed, 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' vol. iv., pp. 107-110, and seem to be the only documentary evidence on the subject seen either by Fox, who deals with the matter in his 'Acts and Monuments,' or by the editors of the 'State Trials,' who make in words the accusation of forgery implied by Fox. The arguments of Fox from the internal evidence of the indictment as it appears in the 'Rot. Parl.' are of no great weight, nor indeed would it be possible to establish such a charge as forgery except by reference to the original on the King's Bench Roll. In support, therefore, of what has been said in the text the indictment has been transcribed in full from the 'Coram Rege' Roll, and is now printed, it is believed, for the first time. The points in which it differs from the Parliamentary transcripts and the erasure are also indicated.

Extract from the 'Coram Rege' Roll, 1 Henry V. (King's Bench, Crown Side), Rex, Hilary, Ro 7.

(The contracted Latin of the original has been extended, but no other alterations have been made in the spelling).

'Adhuc de Termino Sancti Hillarii. Rex. Middlesex. Alias coram Willelmo Roos de Hamelak, Henrico Lescrop Willelmo Crowmere, Maiore Civitatis Londonie, Hugone Huls, et sociis suis, Justiciariis domini Regis ad inquirendum per sacramentum proborum et legalium hominum de civitate domini Regis Londonie et suburbiis ejusdem ac de comitatu Middlesex, tam infra libertates quam extra, de omnibus et singulis prodicionibus et insurreccionibus per quamplures subditos domini Regis Lollardos vulgariter nuncupatos et alios in civitate, suburbiis, et comitatu predictis, factis et perpetratis, necnon de omnibus prodicionibus insurreccionibus, rebellionibus et feloniiis in civitate, suburbiis, et comitatu predictis per quoscunque et qualitercumque factis sive perpetratis et ad easdem prodiciones, insurrecciones, rebelliones, et felonias audiendum et terminandum

Pp. 346-351.
The Indictment of Oldcastle, Blake, and Acton, copied verbatim from the 'Coram Rege' Roll, and compared with the transcript exhibited in Parliament.

secundum legem et consuetudinem regni domini Regis Anglie [¹ per literas ipsius domini Regis patentes assignatis, apud Westmonasterium, die Mercurii proxima post festum Epiphanie Domini, anno regni Regis Henrici quinti post Conquestum primo, per sacramentum xii juratorum extitit presentatum quod Johannes Oldecastell de Coulyng in Comitatu Kancie, Chivaler, (² dominus] Walterus Blake de Bristoll capellanus, Rogerus Acton de Salopia in comitatu Salopie, Chivaler), et alii, Lollardi vulgariter nuncupati, qui contra fidem catholicam diversas oppiniones hereticas et alios errores manifestos legi catholice repugnantes, a diu est, temerarie tenuerunt, oppiniones et errores predictos manutenere aut in facto minime perimplere valentes quam diu regia potestas et tam status regalis domini nostri Regis quam status et officium prelacie dignitatis infra regnum Anglie in prosperitate perseverarent, falso et proditorie machinando tam statum regium quam statum et officium prelatorum necnon ordines religiosorum infra dictum regnum Anglie penitus adnullare, ac dominum nostrum Regem, fratres suos, prelatos, et alios magnates ejusdem regni interficere, necnon viros religiosos, relictis cultibus divinis et religiosis observanciis, ad occupationes mundanas provocare, et tam ecclesias cathedrales quam alias ecclesias et domos religiosas de reliquiis et aliis bonis ecclesiasticis totaliter spoliare ac funditus ad terram prosternere, et [dictum³] Johannem Oldecastell regentem ejusdem regni constituere, et quamplura regimina secundum eorum voluntatem infra regnum predictum quasi gens sine capite in finalem destruccionem tam fidei catholice et cleri quam status et majestatis dignitatis regalis infra idem regnum ordinare falso et proditorie ordinaverunt, et proposuerunt quod ipsi insimul cum quampluribus rebellibus domini Regis ignotis ad numerum viginti millium hominum de diversis partibus regni Anglie modo guerrino arraiatis privatim insurgerent, et die Mercurii proxima post festum Epiphanie Domini, anno regni regis predicti predicto, apud villam et parochiam Sancti Egidii extra Barram veteris Templi Londonie in quodam magno campo ibidem unanimiter convenirent et insimul obviarent pro nephando proposito suo in premissis perimplendo Quo quidem die Mercurii apud villam et parochiam predictas predicti (Walterus, Rogerus⁴) et alii in hujusmodi proposito proditorie perseverantes predictum dominum nostrum Regem, fratres suos videlicet Thomam Ducem Clarencie, Johannem de Lancastre, et Humfridum de Lancastre, necnon prelatos et ¹ The passage in brackets is written on an erasure, in a different hand, and with lighter ink.

² The passage in a parenthesis is omitted from the Roll of Parliament.

³ The word 'dictum' is interlined in a different hand, with lighter ink.

⁴ For the two names in a parenthesis the one name 'Johannes Oldecastell' is substituted in the Roll of Parliament. • magnates predictos interficere, necnon ipsum dominum nostrum Regem et heredes suos de regno suo predicto exheredare, et premissa omnia et singula necnon quam plura alia mala et intollerabilia facere et perimplere falso et proditorie proposuerunt et imaginaverunt, et ibidem versus campum predictum modo guerrino arraiati proditorie modo insurreccionis contra ligancias suas equitaverunt ad debellandum dictum dominum nostrum Regem nisi per ipsum manu forti gratiose impediti fuissent. Quod quidem indictamentum dominus Rex nunc certis de causis coram eo venire fecit terminandum. Per quod preceptum fuit Vicecomiti quod non omitteret quin caperet (eos¹) si etc. (Et² modo, scilicet die Mercurii proxima post Octabas Sancti Hillarii isto eodem termino, coram domino Rege apud Westmonasterium venit predictus Walterus in custodia Marescalli ductus, in cujus custodiam perantea occasionibus predictis per consilium domini Regis commissus fuit. Et super premissis allocutus qualiter se velit inde acquietare dicit quod ipse in nullo est inde culpabilis. Et inde de bono et malo ponit se super patriam. Ideo venit inde jurata coram domino Rege apud Westmonasterium die Sabbati in quindena Sancti Hillarii. Et qui etc. Ad recogn, etc. Et interim predictus Walterus committitur Marescalcie etc. Ad quos diem et locum coram domino Rege venit predictus Walterus in custodia Marescalli. Et juratores exacti similiter venerunt, qui, ad veritatem de et super premissis dicendum electi, triati, et jurati, dicunt super sacramentum suum quod predictus Walterus culpabilis est de premissis superius sibi impositis et quod ipse nulla habet bona seu catalla, terras seu tenementa. Ideo consideratum est quod predictus Walterus Blake distrahatur et suspendatur. Postea, scilicet die Veneris in Octabis Purificacionis beate Marie Virginis, isto eodem termino, coram domino Rege apud Westmonasterium, venit predictus Rogerus Acton per Thomam, Comitem Arundell, et Thesaurarium Anglie, de precepto domini Regis personaliter ductus, qui instanter allocutus est qualiter de prodicionibus et feloniis predictis superius sibi impositis se velit acquietare, qui dicit quod ipse in nullo est inde culpabilis. Et inde de bono et malo ponit se super patriam. Ideo venit inde jurata coram domino Rege apud Westmonasterium die Sabbati proxima post Octabas Purificacionis beate Marie Virginis. Et qui etc. Et ad recogn etc. Et interim predictus Rogerus Acton committitur Turri Londonie per breve domini Regis de recordo hic in Curia etc. Ad quos diem et locum coram domino Rege hic venit predictus Rogerus per Constabularium Turris predicti ductus. Et Juratores exacti similiter venerunt qui ad veritatem de et super premissis dicendum electi, triati, et jurati dicunt super sacramentum suum quod predictus Rogerus Acton culpabilis est de premissis superius sibi impositis et quod ipse nulla habet bona seu catalla terras seu teneamenta. Ideo consideratum est quod predictus Rogerus Acton ducatur abinde usque Turrim domini Regis Londonie et quod ipse ab eadem Turre distrahatur per medium Civitatis predictæ usque novas Furcas in campo Sancti Egidii factas et quod ibidem suspendatur. Et sic suspensus pendeat ad voluntatem domini Regis. ¹ Et, quia predictus Johannes Oldecastell se coram domino Rege occasione predicta non reddidit, preceptum fuit Vicecomiti quod non omitteret etc. quin caperet eum si etc.”), and the usual proceedings in outlawry follow. At the foot of the skin are the words : ‘Memorandum quod Willelmus Hankeford, miles, Capitalis Justiciarius Anglie, die Martis proxima post festum Sancte Lucie Virginis anno regni regis Henrici Quinti quinto, de precepto domini Johannis Ducis Bedford Custodis Anglie detulit coram ipso Custode et magnatibus Anglie in pleno parlamento apud Westmonasterium tunc tento recordum et processum predicta quo ad dictum Johannem Oldecastell in parlamento predicto auctoritate ejusdem parlamenti ad tunc ibidem exequent. et terminand.’

¹ For this word, the words 'prefatum Johannem Oldecastell' are substituted in the Roll of Parliament.

² The whole of the long passage in a parenthesis is omitted from the Roll of Parliament.

Little more light is thrown upon the matter by a document of the next reign (Patent Roll, 7 Henry VI., part i. m. 19, d.), by which an enquiry is directed concerning some of Oldcastle's lands claimed by his son as having been entailed, and therefore, per formam doni, not forfeited for treason. The words, however, in which the authority for Oldcastle's execution is there described show how the matter was regarded in the reign of Henry VI.: ‘auctoritate ejusdem parlamenti, ibidem, et virtute utlagarie predictæ.’

The contemporary song in which there is an allusion to Oldcastle, and a contempt expressed for persons who study to gain the approbation of Lollards, is printed in the ‘Political Poems and Songs,’ Ed. Wright, vol. ii. p. 245. It is possible, indeed, that the word ‘study’ is used merely as a synonym for ‘strive,’ and has no reference to the study of letters, but the prejudice against independent investigation is sufficiently established by the persecutions of the time.

The form of commission directed to a bishop for the arrest of sorcerers, &c., within his diocese is printed in Rymer, vol. viii. p. 427 (Original Edition), from the Patent Roll 7 Henry IV., part i. m. 22.

The terror excited in the English troops by the supposed incantations of the Maid of Orleans is the subject of documents printed in Rymer, vol. x. pp. 459, 472, from the Close Rolls, 8

Pp. 352-353.
Note and reference concerning the ‘unchivalrous-ness’ of Lollardism.

Pp. 353-356.
Records, &c.,
concerning the Maid of Orleans, and the search for Witches under Henry IV. and Henry VI.

¹ The outlawry process against Oldcastle is in a different hand, and written with lighter ink. That fact, however, considered alone, would not be of any importance, Henry VI., m. 11 d., and 9 Henry VI., m. 23. Some particulars are also given in Fabyan, anno 8 Henry VI.

A writ for the arrest of Northfeld, suspected of sorcery, is printed in Rymer, vol. x. p. 505, from the Patent Roll, 10 Henry VI., part ii. m. 13 d. In the same volume and page is a document (Bib. Cott., Cleop., F. 4) relating to the appearance of accused persons before the Council. See also Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council (Ed. Sir Harris Nicolas, Record Commission), vol. iv. p. 114. The reward for witchfinders (1441), (printed from the Pell Rolls) appears in the same volume of Rymer, p. 852.

The account of the trial of the Duchess of Gloucester for witchcraft is from the Patent Roll, 19 Henry VI., part ii. m. 16, printed in Rymer, vol. x. p. 851, from Fabyan, annis 19 and 20 Henry VI., and from the contemporary song quoted in the text, 'Lament of the Duchess of Gloucester' ('Political Poems and Songs,' vol. ii. pp. 205-208), a composition not devoid of a certain pathos.

The imputations against the Duchess of Bedford and her daughter are from the Patent Roll, 9 Edward IV., part ii. m. 5 (in which the exemplification of the Privy Council Proceedings is enrolled). The document is printed in the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' vol. vi. p. 232. The renewal of the charge when the throne was offered to Richard appears in the same volume, p. 241.

Particulars of the trial of Burdett and his accomplices for Constructive Treason, in calculating the time of the king's death by forbidden arts, appear in the Records of the King's Bench.

The particulars of Clarence's attainder are from the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 17 Ed. IV. (vol. vi. p. 193). Fabyan p. 266 tells of the butt of wine.

The well-known story of Jane Shore is from the well-known source Sir Thomas More's 'Historia Ricardi Tertii,' p. 18 (Frankfort Edition of 1689).

Some of the remarks concerning the development of the art of printing were suggested by an exhibition of early specimens of printed books at the rooms of the Archæological Institute.

The increase in the demand for parchment will be apparent to any one who compares the records of any of the courts at the end of the fourteenth century with the same classes of records as they were made up a century or two earlier. Their bulk is many times multiplied, and there is as there would have been no irregularity in entering the outlawry process (which required a considerable time) after the earlier enrolment of the indictment. There is no doubt that the outlawry considered alone was effected in due course, as shown by m. 13 of this Roll, but the facts relating to the indictment speak for themselves.

Pp. 356-358.
Records, &c.,
concerning the Trial and Penance of the Duchess of Gloucester.

Pp. 358-360.
The Duchess of Bedford and her daughter.

Pp. 360-362.
Burdett and Clarence.

Pp. 362-363.
Jane Shore.

Pp. 363-367.
Note and references concerning the introduction of Printing, its relation to ancient seals, the growth of paper manufacture, &c.

no doubt that the demand elsewhere corresponded with the demand apparent in the English law courts.

The exact date at which paper was first made from cotton is not known. There are instances of its use at the beginning of the fourteenth century. The earliest known specimen of linen paper in England seems to have been used in the year 1337. (See Rogers' 'History of Prices,' preface to vol. ii. p. xviii., where there is a description of a piece used for the accounts of Merton College.) This was of the rudest possible fabric. Before the year 1388 the art was developed so far that its utility could no longer be doubted. The paper made in imitation of parchment is described in Toulmin Smith's 'English Gilds' (published by the Early English Text Society), p. 132, and Preface, p. xlv. In the same work, p. 44, will be found the description of the piece of ruled vellum taken out of a book and used for a return to Parliament. Mr. Smith went through the whole of the original writs and returns made in obedience to the order of Parliament in 1388, and now in the Public Record Office. The details given by him, throwing light as they do upon the very period at which the art of paper-making was developed, are, therefore, of very considerable value.

It matters little whether we regard the printer's type as a number of fragments of seals or as a number of small seals each complete in itself. The fact remains, that when printing was invented there was nothing new in it except the manner of arranging the letters and the manner of taking the impression. Stereotyping on wax had been known from time immemorial.

The remarks concerning the use of a seal alone, on occasions when according to modern custom a name would be signed, need no justification to those who are familiar with the most ancient deeds. The use of the seal, which was really equivalent to a signature, has not, indeed, even yet died out, for ancient practices remain when they have become meaningless. But many binding contracts

Pp. 367-368.
References
concerning the ancient use of seal and pen.

can now be made without the use of any seal at all. The ancient equivalent for the modern felony known as forgery, and the difficulties to which its definition gave rise, are illustrated by the cases of 'Johannes de Bosco,' who transferred a seal by means of a heated knife ('Coram Rege' Roll, 6 Ed. II., Easter, Ro. 2, Essex—Emlyn's Hale, Note, p. 180); of Huntinton and Clinton, which was similar ('Coram Rege' Roll, 11 Ed. II., Mich., Ro. 156, Hereford—Emlyn's Hale, ib.); of Redynges, who counterfeited a seal and suffered as a traitor (Patent Roll, 6 Ed. II., part ii. m. 18); and of Clement Peytevin, who not having actually counterfeited the Great Seal, but having transferred it from one document to another, was judged (in the opinion of lawyers, wrongfully) to be a traitor ('Coram Rege' Roll, 2 Henry IV., Hil., Ro. 16, Midd.—Emlyn's Hale, p. 81, note).

It would be out of place in this history to discuss the question whether the invention of printing should be attributed to a native of Holland or to a native of Germany. Block-printing, at any rate, which was the first step, seems to have come from Holland.

Pp. 368-371.
References
concerning printing and commerce in the reign of Edward IV. :
Caxton, the Poles, &c.

The attention paid to commerce in the time of Edward IV. is evident not only in the well-known commission to Caxton to negotiate a commercial treaty with Burgundy, but also in the numerous statutes of the reign which refer to trade and manufactures. The assertion that Edward was himself a trader is made in the 'Continuation of the History of Croyland Abbey' (Fulman), p. 559. The rise of wealthy merchants had already excited the surprise of a foreigner (Poggio Bracciolini, 'Opera,' p. 69). There seems to be little doubt that the aggrandisement of the Poles was effected by the wealth gained in mercantile transactions. The father of Michael de la Pole was named William ('Rot. Parl.,' 5 Ric. II., No. 3; vol. iii. p. 127). A William de la Pole is distinctly mentioned as a merchant in 'Rot. Parl.,' vol. ii. p. 457, and a William de la Pole, who was evidently a person of some influence, at pp. 114, 118, 121, 154, all of which passages are consistent with the supposition that there were not two persons of the same name living at the same time, but that there was only one William de la Pole, at once land-holder and merchant. William, however, though probably in one sense the founder of the family, himself inherited some lands, as shown by 'Rot. Parl.,' vol. i. p. 356; but he had the wisdom to disregard the prejudices of his class. The ordinary contempt of the nobles for city life, appearing in many forms, is mentioned by Bracciolini, who was in England when Cardinal Beaufort was Bishop of Winchester. ('Opera,' p. 69).

The sale of cloth good at the end but faulty in the middle called forth the Statutes 13 Rich. II., St. i. c. 11; 4 Edward IV., c. 1; 8 Edward IV., c. 1, and various others. It was the object of 5 Henry IV., c. 13, to prevent the common trick of selling vessels and ornaments of copper or latten as gold or silver. Frauds by means of casks of deficient capacity are mentioned in 2 Henry VI., c. 11; frauds by means of barrels of fish, in 22 Ed. IV., c. 2. The discredit of English woollen exports in foreign countries through deceptions in weight or quality appears from 8 Henry VI., cc. 22 and 23; from 20 Henry VI., c. 10; from 4 Ed. IV., c. 1, and from subsequent statutes. The tricks of smugglers are mentioned in 4 Ed. IV., cc. 2-4, and in 12 Ed. IV., c. 3. There are provisions against tampering with the coinage in 3 Henry V., Stat. 2, cc. 6, 7, and a provision that gold coin is to be taken by weight only, in 9 Henry V., Stat. i. c. 11.

Pp. 373-376.
Note on town life and country life.

It is hardly necessary to cite passages from the later classics in order to show how great an appreciation the civilised Romans had of town life, how they regarded the country-house as a place of relaxation, and made even the country house as much like a town as possible in its extent and in its luxurious appliances. Their contempt for the man who had never lived in a town could not be better expressed than in the famous words in which Horace refers to an old fable :—

‘Rusticus expectat dum defluat annis.’

This is a curious contrast to the remark of the Italian that the English gentleman of the fifteenth century thought town life beneath his dignity.

It will hardly be supposed that the history of every art can be given in these pages to justify the statement in the text that we owe almost every art directly or indirectly to towns. The Church, no doubt, did much to hand down various arts, and Roger Bacon is a familiar instance, if not of a monkish inventor, at least of a monk who took interest in inventions (See ‘Works’ of Roger Bacon, edited by Mr. J. S. Brewer for the M.R. Series). As many men were living in monasteries with the means of study at hand, it would be strange if they had not contributed something to the knowledge of mankind. But as a matter of fact they contributed little that was new ; their intellects worked in a deep groove, and they were, upon principle, opposed to innovations. We owe them many thanks for having preserved to us a few fragments of Roman literature and Roman art, which Rome had borrowed in part from Greece, and for not having frowned upon Caxton ; but as a class they had no wish that mankind should become more enlightened.

For the text of a great number of the Ordinances of the Craft-Guilds, see Toulmin Smith’s ‘English Gilds.’ They seem to bear out the opinion expressed by Herr Brentano, in his Introduction to the volume, that each craftsman, though a worker with his own hands, had a little stock in trade. The greatest light upon that period of transition, during which the wealthier craftsman was becoming a capitalist, and the poorer a mere working-man, is afforded by the ‘Political Poems and Songs’ published in the M.R. Series by Mr. Wright. In vol. ii. pp. 157–205, will be found the ‘Libel of English Policy,’ and at pp. 282–287 another poem on ‘England’s Commercial Policy.’ In these two documents appear the complaints of the workmen who were still partly retail-dealers, and who sighed for a golden age, which they believed to have existed in the past, when each man received his wage in coin. (The Statute 4 Edward IV., c. i., provides that workmen shall be paid in money and not in goods). Many other curious details are also given in the Songs. A safe-conduct granted in 1452 to some foreign miners brought into England, shows, as well as the Poems, the

Pp. 376–380.
References
concerning trade-guilds,
the relations of capital and labour, and the progress of commerce in the 15th century.

attention which was now being given to metal-work. See Rymer, vol. xi. p. 317, from the French Roll, 31 Henry VI., m. 13. An instance of the export of ship's guns occurs as early as 1411. Rymer, viii., 694, from the French Roll, 12 Henry IV., m. 5.

In 1463 Parliament prohibited the importation of a great number of manufactures, which the artificers asserted could be made better in England than elsewhere (Stat. 3 Edward IV., c. 4).

The Ordinances of many religious or social guilds are, like those of craft-guilds, printed in Toulmin Smith's 'English Gilds.' Their most striking features are well put together in the Introduction. The statement that these guilds retained full vitality after 1388 (the date of the return of the Ordinances to Parliament), is founded on the best authority—the Public Records. Licences to reconstitute a guild, and for the guild to acquire land, are common enough. As instances may be mentioned the licences for the two guilds in the Parish Church of Houghton, for which see Roll No. 2 of Bishop Booth (Durham Cursitor's, No. 49), mem. 13, temp. Edward IV.

It is unnecessary to trace through its various stages a doctrine so well known to every lawyer as that of 'Uses.' The Statute which checked the abuse of this legal fiction by the clergy is 15 Ric. II., c. 5; that which gave it vitality as a legitimate aid to conveyancing is 27 Henry VIII., c. 10.

The best contemporary guide to the ordinary course of legal proceedings about the time of the Wars of the Roses, is Fortescue, 'De Laudibus Legum Angliæ.' The civil trial is described in cc. 25 and 26, the criminal in c. 27; the punishment following an attain of perjured jurors in c. 26. The Statute 15 Henry VI., c. 5, relates to perjury, and in its preamble the prevalence of the offence is lamented. There appears to have been less restraint upon the practice of approving than in earlier times. The Stat. 5 Henry IV., c. 2, recites that 'divers notorious rogues, for the safeguard of their lives, had become provers, to the intent, in the mean time, by brocage and great gifts, to pursue and have their pardons, and then, after their deliverance, had become more notorious felons than before.' That torture was sometimes used to extort confessions is, as already stated, clear from the passage in the Pipe Roll, 34 Henry II., Ro. 10, and the Council Books of later date. It may also be inferred, perhaps, that the practice was not very common, from c. 22 of Fortescue's 'Laudes,' in which indeed, to his honour be it said, he most feelingly denounces the practice; but although he reprobates torture as it existed in France, he does not expressly deny that it was used in England, as foreign and English authors have sometimes assumed. The form into which the 'peine forte et dure' had

Pp. 381-383.
Records concerning the social or religious guilds.

Pp. 384-385.
Statutes relating to 'Uses.'

Pp. 386-388.
Reference concerning legal procedure, the 'peine forte et dure,' &c., in the 15th century.

developed in the fifteenth century will be found in the Year Book, 8 Henry IV., 1, 2. Trials of a later date, of which some minute details have been preserved, show that it was the custom of the judge to examine the prisoner in a manner by no means gentle. That, however, is a matter for future comment. The passage concerning English robbers and their 'hearts,' is from Fortescue on 'Monarchy,' pp. 99-100.

The description by John Hill, the royal armourer, of the formalities observed in a 'Battle of Treason,' has been preserved among the Hale MSS., vol. xii. (xi.)

Pp. 389-392.
Treatise on the Battle of Treason.

In the Hale MSS. also was found the reference to an instrument entitled 'De certis requestis Karolo Adversario Francie ex parte Regis Anglie offerendis.' It occurs on the French Roll 7 Richard II., memb. 24, and is a very remarkable document. Richard addresses it to his uncle, John Duke of Lancaster, whom he desires to approach the French king with the propositions, described in the text, for settling all differences by one final combat.

Pp. 393-394.
Note on the challenge of Richard II. to the French king.

The Statute against forcible entry is known as 5 Richard II., Stat. i. c. 8. Upon the Patent Roll, 15 Richard II., m. 23, will be found the grant of Leonhale Castle, with an express mention of private jurisdiction.

Pp. 394-396.
Forcible entry,
and private jurisdiction
(Ric. II.).

Against maintenance, liveries, retainers, conspiracy, &c., were directed the 'Ordinacio de Conspiratoribus,' 33 Ed. I., the Statutes 1 Ric. II., c. 7, 13 Ric. II., St. 3, 16 Ric. II., c. 4, 20 Ric. II., c. 1, 1 Hen. IV., c. 7, and others down to 8 Ed. IV., c. 2. The Ordinance relating to liberties into which the king's officers do not enter, appears in the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' vol. iv. pp. 421-2. It is also enrolled among the records of the Palatinate of Durham (See Cursitor's Records, Roll 'C,' of Bishop Langley, m. 8)—a proof that it reached one at least of the persons for whom it was intended. The deed by which Sir William Eure becomes the Bishop's retainer is enrolled on the Cursitor's Roll, No. 5, of Bishop Neville, m. 13.

Pp. 396-397.
Statutes and Records concerning liver-ies, retainers,
&c.

The first Statute relating to Scandalum Magnatum is that of Westminster the First, 3 Ed. I., c. 34. It was followed after a long interval by 2 Ric. II., St. i. c. 5, and 12 Ric. II., c. 11. Walter Sibille's case is recorded on the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 8 Ric. II., No. 12 (printed vol. iii. p. 186).

Pp. 398-400.
Statutes and Records
concerning
'Scandalum
Magnatum.'

John Cavendish's accusation against Michael de la Pole, and his punishment for having made it, are recorded on the 'Rot. Parl.,' 7 Richard II., Nos. 11-15 (printed vol. iii. pp. 168-170), and the subsequent judgment against Pole on the 'Rot. Parl.,' 10 Ric. II., Nos. 6-17 (printed vol. iii. pp. 216-220).

The case of Sir Ralph Ferriers and the beggar is from the 'Rot. Parl.,' 4 Ric. II., Nos. 17-26 (vol. iii. pp. 91-93).

Pp. 400-403.
Records concerning corrupt surrender of fortresses, &c.

Charges of surrendering fortresses to the enemy for a bribe will be found in the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 1 Ric. II., Nos. 38-40 (against Weston and Gomenys), 7 Ric. II., No. 17 (against Cressingham), and 7 Ric. II., No. 24, (against Elingham and others), (printed vol. iii. pp. 10-12, 153 and 156).

The similar charges made against William de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, in the reign of Henry VI., appear on the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 28 Henry VI., Nos. 14-51 (printed vol. v. pp. 176-183). Suffolk's murder is related in the 'Continuation of the History of Croyland Abbey,' p. 525 (Fulman).

Gloucester's murder, or private execution, with the religious ceremonies which accompanied it, is described in the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 1 Henry IV., No. 11 (printed vol. iii., pp. 452-3). See also the 10 preceding Nos. The proceedings in which he was declared guilty of treason, at the end of the reign of Richard II., appear in the 'Rot. Parl.,' 21 Richard II., Nos. 1-13 (printed vol. iii., p. 347-351). Attainder, as is well known, followed sentence of death in all cases of treason or felony. The proceeding in Parliament by Bill of Attainder, is, if not more common, more frequently recorded, after the time now under consideration.

For the supposed murder of another Duke of Gloucester in the reign of Henry VI., see Fabyan, p. 619.

Pp. 407-409.
Records concerning the deposition of Richard II., and the false personation of kings after death.

The proceedings which relate to the deposition of Richard appear at great length on the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 1 Henry IV., Nos. 10-60. (printed vol. iii., pp. 416-424), upon which the passage relating to the same subject in the text is founded. It is in No. 60 (p. 424) that Richard 'hoped that is cosyn wolde be goode Lord to hym.'

The Acts and Ordinances of the Privy Council, 4 Henry IV. (vol. i., p. 208) show that Henry Percy had proclaimed King Richard II. to be still alive. A general pardon, excepting Warde, the personator of Richard, appears on the Patent Roll, 5 Henry IV., pt. ii., m. 31, in the form of an exemplification. The view put forward in the text, that Richard lived a very short time after he had been deposed by Henry, seems most in accordance with the spirit of the age. There was, however, a very strong party, which from hatred of Henry, or belief in the survival of Richard, entered into a formidable conspiracy. This is apparent from documents preserved in the Chapter House, and printed, in part, in the 'Chronique de la Traïson et Mort de Richart II. (Ed. Benj. Williams). The 'Coram Rege' Roll (King's Bench), 6 H. IV., m. 5, shows that a supposed Richard had a strong party in Essex and the neighbouring counties. Had he been alive, and in his senses, however, there is little doubt that he would have appeared at the head of an army, and the mention of Warde as a personator goes far to show that an impostor was exposed. Searle, the valet of King Richard, was taken, convicted of treason, dragged through Norwich, Colchester, and other towns, and from Colchester to London. See Foreign Account Roll, 1-6, H. IV.

The particulars relating to the proceedings against Alice Perers, are from the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 1 Richard II., Nos. 41-43 (printed vol. iii. pp. 13-14). The opinion of a later Chief Justice of England upon her case is this:—'The record against the said Dame is long, and approveth no such heinous matter against her. . . . And these two suits, wherefore she was condemned, seemeth very honest. Her mishap was, that being friendly to many, she found not all in like sort affected towards her' (Sir M. Hale's MS., vol. vii.). The restitution of her lands after her marriage to William Windsor, appears by the Patent Roll, 3 Ric. II., part 3, m. 5, the reference to which was found in the Petyt MSS.

Pp. 409-412.
References
concerning the position of women in the 15th century.

The description of the chastisement inflicted on a young lady by her mother is from the 'Paston Letters' (Ed. Fenn), vol. iii., pp. 206-208. This curious collection of letters generally bears out the statement in the text, that the family life was, hardly one of mutual confidence and affection.

Statute 33 Henry VI., c. 5, recites the complaint of the London silk-women, and provides a remedy.

The assault committed by Ralph Garneys in the presence of the Judges in Westminster Hall is thus described in the Inquisition:—

'Ad quod Damnum,' 16 Henry VI., No. 10.

(Spelling as in the original, but contractions extended.)

'Cum Radulfus Garneys, per nomen Radulfi Garneys de Gelston in comitatu Norfolk Armigeri, nuper coram vobis indictatus extiterit de eo quod ipse, sexto die Februarii ultimo preterito inter horam decimam et undecimam ante horam nonam ejusdem diei, apud Westmonasterium in Magna Aula Placitorum infra Palacium nostrum ibidem, apertis tunc et ibidem tam Curia Cancellarie nostre quam Curia nostra Coram Nobis ac Curia nostra de Communi Banco, in presencia tam Justiciariorum nostrorum ad Placita Coram Nobis tenenda assignatorum quam Justiciariorum nostrorum de Banco predicto tunc ibidem sedencium, in Edmundum Fitz-William Deputatum Johannis Ducis Norfolk Marescalli Marescalcie nostre Coram Nobis adtunc et ibidem quandam indenturam officium ejusdem Edmundi Marescalcie predicte tangentem inspicientem tunc ibidem affraiam et, insultum fecit, ac ipsum Edmundum cum pugillo ipsius Radulfi manus

P. 412.
Record (in full) of a brawl in Westminster Hall.

sue dextere super faciem ejusdem Edmundi tunc ibidem percussit, per quod tam Justiciarii et alii ministri nostri Curiarum predictarum quam Domini Spirituales et Temporales ex Consilio et circa Consilium nostrum tunc ibidem existentes et attendentes tunc et ibidem tam graviter perturbati extiterunt quod iidem Justiciarii et alii ministri Curiarum predictarum circa Placita nostra ac diversorum ligeorum nostrorum ac Domini dicti Spirituales et Temporales circa consilium nostrum tunc ibidem attendere non potuerunt'—a Commission issues to enquire what lands were held by Garneys.

A reference to this curious document, which illustrates the customs observed at Westminster, as well as Garneys' crime, was found in the Hale Collection.

The assault with a great armed company, in the king's presence in the Star Chamber, is the subject of the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 28 Henry VI., No. 56 (printed vol. v., pp. 200-1).
Pp. 413-415. Records concerning armed forces in law-courts, mutilation, misdeeds of soldiers, &c.
 The instance in which four hundred armed men rode to Walsingham to prevent justice being done is from the Paston Letters, vol. iii., p. 118.

Statute 5 Henry IV., c. 5, is that which relates to the cutting out of tongues, and the putting out of eyes. Statute 33 H. VI., c. 1, deals with the habit, which servants had, of scrambling for their master's goods as soon as he was dead.

The complaints of the misdeeds of English soldiers bound for France appear on the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 20 Hen. VI., No. 34 (printed vol. v. p. 61). The account of similar practices under Edward IV., and of the King on circuit, is from the 'Continuation of the History of Croyland Abbey' (Fulman, p. 559).

A contemporary account of some of Jack Cade's doings is given in one of the Paston Letters, vol. i., pp. 54-62. It there appears that Sir John Fastolf was suspected of having 'minished all the garrisons of Normandy and Manns, and Mayn, the which was the cause of the losing of all the king's title and right of an heritance that he had beyond sea.' The thoughts of a knight's wife for the defence of her home are expressed in vol. iii., pp. 314-316, her thoughts for bedchamber and malthouse in vol. iii., p. 324, the difficulty of communication in vol. ii., p. 72 (where the opportunity of sending a letter at the time of Bartholomew fair is mentioned as one too good to be lost). The thieves on the roads about London, and the impossibility of sending money, are described in vol. iii., p. 254, the unhealthy condition of the towns in vol. ii., pp. 74-76, and riots, routs, affrays, and forcible entries, in very many letters.

The description given in Parliament of the state of England during the Wars of the Roses is from the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 1 Richard III., No. 1 (Printed vol. vi., p. 238).

Preambles of statutes and statements made in Parliament have frequently been used in illustration of the condition of the country, and they are very valuable where they describe the condition as existing when a statute was made, or immediately before, but they are of no value where they describe the condition as existing in ages before the describers lived. They then become second-hand authorities, giving merely the historical opinions of petitioners who wished to prove a case, but who were not recording the events of their own time. It would not be difficult to prove on such evidence that the country had progressively lost population, wealth, and good morals, for nothing more frequently occurs in the preamble of a statute than a statement that the evil to be remedied is of quite recent growth, and entirely unknown to previous generations. The statement, in some statutes of the Tudor period, that certain towns had become less populous than in earlier times, is in all probability incorrect, even as applied to the particular towns mentioned, and gives a wholly false idea of the development of commerce and town life as a whole. The subject, however, is one which may be more appropriately touched in another volume, though it seemed necessary to show in this that a possible objection had not been overlooked.

Note on the value of statements in the preambles of statutes.

A charge of peculation against a Chancellor was, as has been incidentally mentioned in the cases of the Poles, of very common occurrence. Corruption of Judges is indicated in the Statute 8 Richard II., c. 4, but still more by the widespread maintenance and intimidation; corruption of the 'Pincerna' in the Patent Roll 8 Richard II., part 2, m. 30, d.; and of various revenue officers, in the 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' 11 Henry IV., No. 25 (printed vol. iii. p. 625). Bribery of sheriffs is the subject of 18 Henry VI., c. 14; and in the reign of Edward IV. there was a commission to enquire concerning neglect of duty and partiality on the part of sheriffs, throughout the whole realm (Patent Roll, 13 Edward IV., part ii., m. 8 d.). The outcry against Empson and Dudley in the reign of Henry VII. was no more than an expression of dissatisfaction which had continued for centuries. The mention of bloodshed by the dagger, drawn in haste, is very common in the criminal proceedings of the period, and was not then considered by any means 'un-English.' The exposure of traitors' heads upon London Bridge was too frequent to need special references in proof of it. There is, however, a curious collection in illustration of the subject among the Petyt MSS. ('Theatrum Criminalium,' vol. iv.). The influence of royal blood is shown by writs directed to sheriffs in favour of the widows of some traitors,

Pp. 420-421.
Evidence of the state of society towards the end of the 15th century.

who are permitted to receive their husbands' heads and to bury them. Such writs are enrolled on the Close Roll, 1 Henry IV., part i. m. 9 (concerning the head of the Earl of Kent), and m. 12 (concerning the head of the Earl of Huntingdon). See also the same roll, m. 19 (concerning the head of Thomas le Despenser, sent from Bristol to London), and the Close Roll, 5 Henry IV., part i. mm. 1, 25, 28, for other instances, including one of a head set on the pillory at Cambridge (m. 1). The Close Roll of Henry IV., m. 10, illustrates the manner in which heads and quarters were distributed, and afterwards, sometimes, collected. The practice of quartering traitors of noble birth died out about the end of the fifteenth century, though the sentence was passed upon them as before, and persons of inferior birth suffered the full horrors of the judgment.

INDEX.

The References are, as far as possible, in accordance with the best known descriptions of the various matters, and, therefore, not always consistent, e.g. 'Patent Rolls' and 'Rotuli Curiae Regis,' 'John of Salisbury' and 'Radulfus de Diceto.'

ABB

ABBOTS, offences charged against, 198-201, 247, 275, 466, 475, 479
 Abduction of heiresses, 261, 477
 Abingdon, Abbot of, 243; Fair at, interrupted, ib., 474
 Abjuration of the realm, by persons acquitted at the Ordeal, 131. By suspected persons unable to find sureties, 219. By persons who had taken sanctuary, 232-233, 472
 Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, virtue attributed to the names of, 37, 432
 Accessary. Sæ Principal
 Accusations, merciful provisions with respect to, in the Roman Law, 17, 427. Fellow-swearers in, according to Ancient Laws in England, 56, 438. Absurd and false, made against the Jews, 195-196, 464. False, made by persons convicted before Justices of Trailbaston, 222, 470. Of Treason from corrupt motives, 228-229, 471. False, of importing bad coin, 267-268. By approvers, how regarded, 286-289, 478. By appeal of injured persons, neither popular nor effectual, 289-293, 481. False, against Ralph Ferriers, 400, 499. See Appeals, Indictment Acton, Roger, Indicted for Treason, 346. Sentence on, 351. Aims of, ib., 490-493
 Admirals, Commission to inquire into the conduct of, 229, 471. Want of respect for, 234, 472
 Adultery, of a slave with a free-woman, a capital offence in the case of the woman, and punished by burning in the case of the slave, 14-15, 426
 Advowsons, disputed claim to, settled by duel, 205, 467
 Ælfred. See Alfred
 Aids, an excrescence upon the feudal system, 448

ANI

Affrays, common in Law-Courts in the 14th century, 256-257, 477; and in the reign of Henry VI., 412, 501-502
 Ale, punishment for the brewers of bad, 173
 Alfred, King, his superiority to his contemporaries, 85. His influence powerless to change the tone of society, ib. Ferocious spirit of the laws bearing his name, 86, 445. Popular exaggeration of the good effected by him, 107. Note on the spelling of his name, 434. References to the laws of, 437, 439, 445
 Alien Priors, petitions against, in Parliament, 306, 484. General dissatisfaction with, 342. Taken into the King's hand, 343, 489
 Allodial tenure, burdens of, 75, 441. Privileges incident to, 78, 441-442. Enjoyed by the burgesses of Canterbury, 174-175, 461-462
 Alms-giving, a substitute for the penance of fasting, 47, 437. The effects of this commutation, 48. To lepers in the 14th century, 239, 473. Contrasted with charity, ib.
 Amalfi, alleged discovery of Justinian's 'Pandects' at, 133
 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of England' (including the 'Monumenta Ecclesiastica'), referred to, 428, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 447, 449, 450
 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of Ireland' (Senchus Mor), referred to, 436
 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales,' referred to, 436
 'Anglia Judaica,' documents in the, referred to, 463, 464, 465
 'Anglo-Saxon Chronicle,' the, referred to, 440, 447
 Anicetus, Pope, 433

Annalists, method of, rejected, 404
 Antonine, 'Itinerary' of, 24, 429
 Apostate monks, warrants to arrest, 308, 484. Early indications of Lollardism in, 310, 329
 Appeal, Court of, before the Conquest, 84, 444. To Rome a right asserted by Becket, 116, 449
 Appeals (accusations by an individual), difficulty of conviction in, 208-210. Partiality of Sheriffs shown by tampering with writs and packing juries in, 276-277, 278-279, 479. By approvers, 286-289, 481. A substitute for the ancient blood-feud, 289-290. Why almost useless as an instrument of justice, 290. Difficulties of accusers in, with instance, 289-292, 481. How far remedies for private wrongs, 289-290
 Appearance of some criminals described, 2, 425
 Apprentices, the London, join Wat Tyler and afterwards behead their masters, 332, 335, 487-488 Appropriation, the revenues of parish churches acquired for religious houses by, 340-341, 488-489. Discontent excited by, 341. Attempt to remedy the evils of 343, 489
 Approvers, evidence of, rejected according to Roman Law, 17, 427. Hatred of, in the Middle Ages, 286-287, 481. Prisoners forced to become, by duress or torture in gaol, 287-288, 481. Great number of deaths of, in prison, 288, 481. Conduct of, and refusal of the battle by, after making their accusations, 288-289, 481. Advantages enjoyed by clerks as, 303, 483
 Aquensis, Albertus, referred to, 458
 'Archæologia,' references to the, 429, 430, 476
 Archbishop of Canterbury. See Canterbury Archbishop of York. See York
 Archdeacon, description of the Court of Henry II., by an, 142-144, 456. Description of a Bishop by an, 147-148, 456. Fraudulent proceedings in the Court of an, 281-282, 480
 Archers, frauds by an arrayer of, 265, 477
 Architecture, how far known to the primitive Teuton, 73, 441. Taste in, due to town-life, 373
 Arena, Roman punishments in the, 12, 20, 426, 428
 Arkwright, beginnings and effects of the inventions of, 418
 Arms, assise of, 180, 219, 469
 Army, composition of the English, under Edward II., 180, 462-463

Array, 180
 Arson, punishment for, according to the Assise of Northampton, 131, 451
 Art, works of, pride of each Roman city in its own, 25, 429. Their abundance in villas in Britain, 27, 429-430. Multiplied by the growth of towns, 373
 Aryan Languages, superstitions, and the fine for homicide not peculiar to the speakers of, 42, 434-436. Tenure of land in common not peculiar to the speakers of, 76, 441-442
 Aspect of the Country (England), in the 14th century, 241-242, 473
 Assassins, England once reputed a land of, 62-63, 440. In England after the Norman Conquest, 96, 98, 447
 Assaults, in Law-Courts, 256-257, 412, 477, 501-502
 Asser, remarks upon the life of Alfred attributed to, 444-445
 Assise, of Clarendon, 119-120, 122, 130-133, 450. Of Northampton, 122, 130-133, 451. The Grand, and its relation to other proceedings, 124-128, 451. Of Arms, 180, 219, 469. Commission of, 221. Justices of, ib., 469
 Attainder, of Roger Mortimer reversed, 227, 471. Regarded as a device for acquiring lands, 229, 471, 488. After death, not uncommon, 406, 500. Bill of, ib. Followed sentence of death in all cases of Treason or Felony, 500
 Attaint, meaning of an, 386. Effects of conviction upon, ib., 498
 Augustine, superstitions in England before and after the mission of, 32-41, 431-435
 Avegay, Jewess and usurer, 190-191, 463, and frontispiece Aylesbury, manufacture of false coin at, 266, 478. Forgeries at, 269, 478
 Azincour, battle of, 394

BACON, Lord, previous history to be considered in estimating the character of, 283. Opinion of, upon the burning of heretics, 489
 Badby, John, writ for the burning of, 490
 Bail, reciprocal, before the Conquest, 57-64, 438-440
 Bakers, punishment of fraudulent, in London in the fourteenth century, 237, 473. Women employed as, 255-256, 411, 476, 501 Ball, John, doctrines of, 329, 332, 487. Released from prison by Wat Tyler's men, 332. Chosen to be primate by the rebels, 334, 487-488

Barons, the, jealously guarded their own jurisdictions, 217-218, 469. Benefits from the exhaustion of, in the Wars of the Roses, 419

Bath, called a chester by the Teutonic invaders, 68, 440. Population of under Edward II., 181, 462-463

Battle, the, the wager of, or trial by, introduced by the Normans, 100-101, 448. Glanville's description of, 124-125, 451. Exemption from desired and gained by the townsmen, 175, 448. Claim to an advowson referred to, and description of the scene, 205, 467. Begins to be supplanted by the petty jury in criminal trials, 206-208, 467-468. Dreaded by approvers, 289, 481. The proceedings of, in charges of Treason, 389-392, 499. Relation of to war, public and private, 392-394

Baxter, gradual change in the meaning of the word, 255, 476

Baynard's Castle, curious jurisdiction attached to, 83, 443

Beaufort, Cardinal, position of under Henry VI., 356. A Duchess of Gloucester tried for witchcraft before, 356-357, 494

Becket, Thomas à, his quarrel with Henry II., 115-116. Murder of, 117-118, 449-450. Pilgrimages to the tomb of, 150, 456

Bede, first appearance of England in the historical works of, 46, 70, 437, 440. Referred to also at pp. 432, 445

Bedels, corruption of, at the end of the twelfth century, 143-144, 456

Bedford, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Letters and seals counterfeited in the neighbourhood of, 269, 478

Bedford, Jacqueline, Duchess of, mother of Elizabeth the wife of Edward IV., 358. Precautions taken by against a charge of witchcraft, 359. Suspicion of witchcraft against, mentioned in Parliament, 360, 494

Beggars, on behalf of hospitals, how punished for fraud in London in the fourteenth century, 237, 473. Provisions against in the Statutes of Labourers and of 1388, 341-342, 488

Beheading. See Decapitation

Benedictus Abbas, referred to, 452, 457, 458, 469

Benefit of Clergy, growth of, 104-105, 116, 449. Unsuccessfully claimed by a rector guilty of maihem, and why, 212, 468. The effects of, considered in relation to popular feeling, 297-298. Proceedings upon the claim of, 298-299, 482-483. To what class allowed, 300-301, 482-483. Extent of the advantages secured by, 299-300, 301-302, 482-483. Jealousy excited by, shown in verdicts of juries, &c., 302-303, 483. State of education inferred from, 314, 485

Beowulf, the poem of, 433

Beverley, charter to, and recognition of the guild and hanse-house at, 174, 460. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463

Bible the, translation of, by Wycliffe, 338

Bigamy, meaning of, in the clerical sense, 300. Benefit of Clergy lost by, ib. The Statute of, 483

Bills, forgery of Exchequer, in the reign of Edward III., 273-274, 479.

Bishops, legal functions of the, before the Conquest, 84, 443-444. Description of one by an Archdeacon at the end of the twelfth century, 147-148, 456. Part taken by in political affairs, and consequent scandals in the fourteenth century, &c., 338-340, 488. Proposal to abolish, in the time of Oldcastle, 351, 491. To seek out and imprison sorcerers, 353-354, 493

Black Book, the, of the Exchequer, 453-454

Black Death, the, advantage of studying the period immediately preceding, 310, 316-319. Approach of the, from the East to England, 319. Ravages of the, 320. Immediate after-effects of the, 321, 485

Blackheath, muster of rebels under Wat Tyler at, 332, 487, 488

Blake, Walter, indictment of, for treason, 346, 490-493. Sentence on, 351. Aims of, ib. 490-493

Blois, Peter of, character of, 147-148, 456. Description of a Bishop by, ib.

Blood-feud, the, among the ancient Germans and other barbarous tribes, 41, 436. In England, 57, 438-439. Satisfaction of, 57-62, 438-439. The Appeal of Murder a substitute for, 289-290, 481

Boc-land, 81

Bodmin, relics stolen from the Abbey of, 150-151, 456

Bollington, offences charged against the Prior of, 248, 475

Bonfires, of sham wares, in London, in the fourteenth century, 238, 473

Bonds, forgery of, in the reign of Edward III., 273-274, 479

Borough ('burh,' 'byrig'), history of the meaning of the word, 70-71. Compared with the Roman 'castra,' or chester, ib. Relation of the borough to the shire, 71-73, 441. See Towns

BOS

- Boston, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
- Brabazons, or Routiers; brigands, heretics, and mercenary soldiers so called, 156-157, 457
- Bracciolini, Poggio, on the habits of the English, 496
- Bracton, evidence of, concerning the distinction between English and Normans in England under Henry III., 138, 455. Definition of murder, and Presentment of Englishry according to, 455. Evidence of concerning the growth of the second or petty jury, 467-468
- Branding on the forehead, forbidden by Constantine, 20, 428. Practised according to ancient laws in England, 50, 437. Applied to the Paterine heretics, 155, 457
- Brewers, male and female, how punished in Chester for brewing bad ale, 173. Women employed as, 255-256, 476
- Brewster, gradual change in the meaning of the word, 255, 476
- Bribery, of Judges and other officials at the end of the twelfth century, 143-144, 456. In the reign of Edward III., 229-231, 471. Of Chief Justice Thorpe, 282, 480. Of commanders, for the surrender of garrisons, 401-402, 500
- Bridges, maintenance of, under the Empire, 22, 428. Maintenance of, after the Teutonic invasion, 75, 441
- Brigands, bands of, described as heretics, 156-157, 457. Their offences to be enquired into under commissions of Trailbaston, or other special commissions, 222, 469-470. Outrages of, in the fourteenth century, 242-243, 474. Their attacks during fairs and markets, 243, 474. Bristol in the hands of, 243-244, 474. Townsmen, knights, and the clergy commit the acts of, 246-253, 475. Produced by the ancient right of private war and doctrine of entry upon lands, ib. The travelling justices commonly obstructed by, 257, 476-477. Intimidation of prosecutors and suitors by, 257-258, 477. Not incapable of the meaner crimes, 259-260. Forgeries, and false personations by, 270-272, 478-479
- Bristol, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Story of the Jew of, tortured in the reign of John, 186, 463. In the hands of brigands in the fourteenth century, 243-244, 474. Outrage attributed to the Prior of, 250-251, 475
- Britain, its early condition uncertain, 10, 425-426. Alleged executions by fire

CAM

- in, 10-12, 425-426. Roman organisation in, the same as elsewhere, 22, 428-429. Full development of Roman civilisation in, 23-24, 429. Loss to, when abandoned by the Romans, 24. Roads, towns, and works of art in, ib., 429-430. A journey in Roman, 25, 429-430. A villa in, described, 26-29, 430. General sense of security in, 29-30. Pacatian Vicar or Governor of, 26, 29, 429, 431. Superstitions in, 33, 41, 431-432. Introduction of Christianity into, 35, 432-433. Whether the earlier occupants of, were destroyed by Teutonic invaders, a question of little importance in the history of Crime, 69
- Britanny, the Justice of, 150-151
- British Museum, MSS. in, referred to, 461, 467
- Bruerne, law-suit between the Abbot of and the Abbot of Cirencester, and forgery of a charter in the Abbey of, 275-276, 479
- Burdett, Thomas, sentenced for witchcraft, or necromancy construed into Treason, 361, 494
- Burgage-tenure, 174, 461-462
- Burgesses, guild-hall of at Dover, and guild of at Canterbury before the Norman Conquest, 64-65, 173-174, 440, 462. Guilds of probably existed before the Conquest, where the guilds are not mentioned, 460. See Towns
- Burglary, a common amusement of London merchants in the twelfth century, 141-142, 456. Parsonages most commonly selected for, in the fourteenth century, 303, 483
- Burial, fraudulent, at Lynn, 296, 482
- Burning, punishment by, attributed to ancient Gauls and Britons, 10-12, 425. Practised by the Romans, 12, 14, 34, 426, 432. Atrocious form of, in ancient laws of England, 51, 438. Of the entrails, a part of the punishment for Treason, and why, 226, 470-471. For heresy, 344-345, 489-490
- Bury St. Edmund's, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
- CCADE, Jack, accusations of treachery made by, 415. His rebellion the beginning of the Wars of the Roses, 415, 502
- Cesar, referred to, 425, 436, 441
- Calais, siege and capture of, by the English, 232. Bribes offered for the surrender of, 401, 499. Murder of Gloucester at, 404-405, 500
- Cambridge, the king's writs and money

CAN

- forcibly taken from the king's officers at, 251-252, 475. The Mayor of, attacked in presence of the justices, 257, 477
- Canidia, the Roman witch, powers attributed to, 33, 431
- Canon Law, privileges claimed for the clergy by the, 116. Effects of compurgation according to the, 299-300, 482-483
- Canterbury, guild of burgesses at, before the Norman Conquest, 64, 440. Private jurisdictions in, before the Conquest, 83, 443. Lanfranc, Archbishop of, 94, 446. Right claimed by Becket as Archbishop of, 117, 449-450. Primacy of the see of, disputed, 148-149, 456. Pilgrimages to, 150, 456. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Stephen Langton, Archbishop of, 188, 463. A close of the Archbishop of, broken by chaplains and others, 247-248, 475. Oath taken by the Archbishop of, 304, 484. Death of an Archbishop of, in the plague of 1349, 320, 485. Unpopularity and murder of Sudbury, Archbishop of, 331-332, 336, 487-488
- Canute, King, development of the Peace-Pledge under, 60, 440. Ferocious spirit of his laws, 86, 444-445. Aims of, 87, 445. Forest laws under, 214, 468. Note on the spelling of the name of, 434
- Capital, early relations of, to labour, 378-380, 497-498
- Capital punishment, under the Romans, 12, 15, 16, 426, 427. The Conqueror's reason against, 100. Forms of, in the ancient laws of England, 50-51, 438. For Treason, 226, 470-471. Imitation of, in Wat Tyler's Rebellion, 336-337, 487-488
- Carta, Magna. Sæ Magna Carta
- 'Cartæ Antiquæ,' the, referred to, 459, 460, 461
- Castles, erection of, in England immediately after the Conquest, and the effects, 105-106. Erection of, in Stephen's reign, and the effects, 112, 449
- Cattle used instead of coin in the reign of the Conqueror, 110
- Causins, the, or Pope's money-changers, 192, 464. The 'Jewry' pledged to, 193, 464. Are troublesome creditors to many of the clergy, 198, 465
- Cavendish, John, accused of 'Scandalum' against Michael de la Pole, the Chancellor, 399, 499
- Caxton, patronised by Edward IV., 364. Printing introduced into England by, 369-370, 496

CHE

- Celibacy ill borne by the clergy in England before the Conquest, 93, 446; and immediately afterwards, 102, 448
- Challenge of jurors, 206, 388, 467
- Chamber, the Steward or Seneschal of the, commissioned to enquire concerning forgeries of Exchequer Bills, 273, 479
- Champions always substituted for the parties interested, in the civil trial by battle, 205. Account of an interrupted battle between, in the reign of Henry III., ib., 467
- Chancellor, the, fraudulent purveyance in the name of, 269-270, 478. Commissioned to enquire concerning forgeries of Exchequer Bills, 273, 479. Accusations against Michael de la Pole, the, 399-400, 499. Charges of peculation against, frequent in the Middle Ages, 420
- Chancery, Records of the Court of, carried on a pack-horse, 234, 235, 473. Confirmation of a forged charter in the, 275-276, 479
- Chaplains, great numbers of, accused of forcible entry and brigandage, 246-253, 475. False personation of Queen Philippa's agent by a chaplain associated with brigands, 271, 478-479
- Charity, want of, in the Middle Ages, and subsequent prevalence of, 153. Contrasted with alms-giving in the fourteenth century, 239. As shown by guilds of the fifteenth century, compared with that shown in the nineteenth, 381-383
- Charles VI., of France, challenged to single combat by Richard II., 393-394, 499
- Charles VII., of France, success of, through the Maid of Orleans, 354-355, 493
- Charters, to towns, 170-175, 459-462. Common practice of forging, in religious houses, 274, 479. Example of the manner in which they were forged and made evidence in court, 274-275, 479. Of pardon; see Pardons
- Chaucer, the writings of, illustrated by the Records, 306, 310, 485. Living at the time of the Black Death, 309. Quotations from, 311, 485. State of society and of the Court illustrated by, 312, 485. English spoken at Court in the time of, 312-313. Compared with the 'Plowman,' 311, 315
- Cheats in gaming in the twelfth century, 145-146, 456. In gaming and trade, how punished in the fourteenth century, 237-238, 473
- Chester, name given by the city of, to

CHE

- a shire, 72. See removed from, to Coventry, 99, 447. The seat of filth at, according to Domesday, 173
- Chester, or 'Castra,' term adopted by Teutonic invaders to designate a Roman station, 67-70, 440. Compared with the Teutonic borough ('byrig,' 'burh'), 70-71
- Chichester, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
- Chief Justice of England, appearance of delegates from chartered towns before the, 177, 462. Acceptance of bribes confessed by William Thorpe, the, 282-283
- Chiltern Hills, the right of hunting on, claimed by the citizens of London, and recognised by charter, 172, 459
- 'Chivaler,' the title of, 249. Acts by persons styled, 247-252, 261-262, 265. See Knight
- Chivalry, affectation of, at the time of the Third Crusade, 163. As illustrated by Richard, Cœur-de-Lion, 167-168. As illustrated by the ordinances for the punishment of Crusaders, 168-169, 458. As illustrated by the deeds of 'chivalers' in the fourteenth century, 247-252, 475. Want of respect for human life in the age of, 255, 404, 476. Dishonesty characteristic of the age of, 261-262, 283, 477. Want of sympathy for the fatherless and the widow in the age of, 290. The age of, seen at its best in the year before the Black Death, 317-319. Superior learning, in mediæval opinion, inconsistent with, 353, 493. Prisoners of war regarded as articles of commerce in the age of, 355. The good points in, 389, 390, 499. Illustrated by the conduct of Richard III., 409. The position of women in the age of, 409-411, 501
- Christianity, softening influence of, upon Roman Law, 19-20, 427-428. Distinction between its morals and those of heathenism, 19. Effect of pagan superstitions upon, 35-41, 432-435. Introduction of, into Britain, 35, 432-433. Superstitions in, after Augustine's mission, 38-41, 433-435. Absence of its spirit in the Pre-Norman laws of England, 46. Corruption of, by commutation of penances, 47-48, 437. Argument used in favour of, by a pagan chieftain, 87, 445. Improvement in the condition of women effected by, 91-93. Final prevalence of the higher conception of, 153
- Chronicles, mediæval, their defects, 5. Tone of morals in, before the Norman

CIV

- Conquest, 63, 440. Do not throw so much light as records upon the state of society, 317
- 'Chronique de la Traïson et Mort de Richart II.,' referred to, 500
- Church, the, exorcism of demons and various superstitions sanctioned by, 39, 434-435. Policy of, in effecting conversions, 40. Corruption of, through commutation of penances, 48, 437. Influence of, in improving the condition of women, 91-93. Discontent in England caused by the policy of, at the time of the Conquest, 102. Attempts to constitute the Pope the feudal superior of kings, 102-103, 448-449. Claims of, and quarrel of, with Henry II., 115-116, 449-450. Did not support the poor in the twelfth century, 151-153, 457. Alleged offences against, by the Jews, 194-195, 464-465. Profited by the expulsion of the Jews, 197-198, 465. Its good influence in abolishing the ordeal, 204, 467. Position of, with respect to Crime in the fourteenth century, 297-302, 482-484. Widespread desire for reform in, from the fourteenth century downwards, 298. Corruption of, denounced by courtiers as well as Lollards, 342, 488-489. Henry IV. and Henry V. feared the power of, 343, 489. The defence of, assigned as the reason for burning heretics by the secular power, 345, 489. See Clergy
- Churls, more severely punished than their superiors, 50, 437. Always in danger of reduction to slavery, 89-90, 445. Not injured by the Norman Conquest, 103, 448. See Villeins
- Cinque Ports, the, not mentioned in a roll containing the names of other towns in the reign of Edward II., 179, 462-463. Character of the seamen of, 233-234, 472. Yarmouth a dependency of the, 234
- Circuits, beginning of, in the form of eyres, 108. Difference of from eyres, 135, 452-453
- Cirencester, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Forgery of a charter to defraud the Abbot of, 275-276, 479.
- Cities. See Towns
- Civilisation, the Roman, fully enjoyed in Britain, 22, 23, 429-430. Tokens of, in early England, out of harmony with the barbarity of the criminal laws, 76. Extinction of Roman, in rural England, 87. Easily destroyed, and with difficulty renewed, 171. Effect of the growth of towns with respect to, 175, 373-374, 377. Causes of its slow development in England, 176. The savage's view of, handed down by tradition, 260. Does not increase fraud when it diminishes violence, 260-264. Effects of an ill example set by government in checking, 266. Has the effect of separating the criminal classes from the industrial, 286. Anomalies in the growth of, 364. Retarded by ancient custom, favoured by material progress, after the Wars of the Roses, 397. Of the fourth and of the fifteenth centuries, compared, 417. Modern, may be said to begin with the reign of Henry VII., 419.

CIV

Civil Law, renewed study of the Roman, 133, 452. The study of perverted to fraudulent objects, 384, 498

Civil War. See War

Clarence, George, Duke of, charged with having imputed witchcraft to Edward IV., 361, 494. Death of, 362.

Clarendon, Assise of, 119-120, 122, 130-133, 450

Classes distinguished by the Romans in awarding punishments, 13-14, 426. Division of under the Empire, 20-23, 428-429. Distinguished in awarding punishments according to Teutonic laws and early laws in England, 44-51, 437. In the reign of Henry II., 139, 453-455. No immediate change in the division of, effected by the Conquest, 139. Effect of the growth of towns upon the division of, 175. Beginning of the modern grouping of, 380, 497-498

Clergy, belief of the, in witchcraft, 38-39, 434-435. Responsibility of the, for ancient laws in England, 49, 52. Their connexion with the ordeal and compurgation, 52-55, 438. Effect of marriages among the, upon the position of women, 92. Character of the, in England, before the Conquest, 93, 446. The native, disinclined to celibacy at the time of the Conquest, 102, 448. They profit by the anarchy of Stephen's reign, 114. They were averse to uniformity in legal proceedings, ib. Character of, at the end of the twelfth century, 143-144, 146-151, 456. Of the two provinces exchange blows at Westminster, 148-149, 456. Their relation to the poor before the dissolution of monasteries, 151-153, 457. Their hostility to the Jews, 187-189, 463. Their debts to the Jews, 189-190, 463. Their reluctance to repair the roads, 240-242, 473. Acts resembling brigandage committed by the, 247-252, 475. Want of respect for the, in the fourteenth century, 297. Jealousy excited by the privileges of the, shown in verdicts, 302-303. Unpopularity and encroachments of the, 303-304, 483. Opposition by, to execution of legal judgments, 305, 484. Misapplication of revenues and evasion of duties by, 305-306, 484. Numbers of, accused of homicide, etc., 307, 484. Disunion among the, before the Black Death, 308, 484-485. Description of, in 'Piers Plowman's Vision,' and by Chaucer, 311-312, 485. Discontent among both secular and regular, at the time of the Black Death, 329, 487. Part taken by the, in public affairs, 339-340, 488. Dissatisfaction of secular, with Appropriations, 341, 488. Agitation against, associated with political discontent, 340-342, 351-352, 488-489. The children of the rich kidnapped by the, 342, 489. Alliance of, with the higher classes against heretics, 342-343. Not alone responsible for the death of Oldcastle, 350. Improvement in the character of, since the fifteenth century, ib. Study among the laity discouraged by the, 352, 493. See Benefit of Clergy, Christianity, Church

COI

Clerk, the Chief, of the Court of King's Bench accused of taking bribes, and threatened, 279-280, 479-480

Clerkenwell, destruction of the Priory at, in Wat Tyler's rebellion, 334, 487-488

Clerks, definition of, 300-301, 482-483. Clipping. See Coin

Close Rolls, referred to, 463, 464, 465, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 475, 477, 478, 479, 481, 484, 487, 490, 493, 504

Cloth, frauds in the manufacture or sale of, 371-372, 496

Cnut. See Canute.

Cockayne's 'Leechdoms,' referred to, 433, 435, 437

'Codex Diplomaticus,' referred to, 440, 442, 444, 479

'Codex Theodosianus,' see Theodosian Code

Coin, the makers of false, burnt by the Romans, 14, 426. Great quantities of Roman, found in England, 24. Unknown to the primitive Teuton, 73, 74, 441. Early manufacture of, in England, after the Teutonic invasion, 74. Live stock as a substitute for, at the time of the Conquest, 110, 441, 449. Scarcity of, ib. Makers of base, how punished by Henry I., and how previously, 111, 449. Made at private mints in the reign of Stephen, 111-

COK

- 112, 449. Makers of base, how punished according to Assises of Clarendon and Northampton, 131, 450. Clipping and counterfeiting of, commonly attributed to the Jews, 186, 191, 464-465. Execution of 280 Jews, in London, for clipping or counterfeiting, 195-196, 465. Exportation of English, forbidden, 265, 478. Importation of base, by merchants, 232, 265-266, 478. Debased by authority, 266, 478. Manufacturers of false, in England, 266-267, 478. False charges made by examiners of the, 267-268, 478. Frauds at the authorised mints with respect to, 268, 478. State of the, in the fifteenth century, 372, 496
- Coke upon Littleton, Wager of Law in, 450
- Colchester, privileges allowed to the burgesses of, by charter, 172, 459
- 'Collegia,' Roman, 23. Existence of, in Britain, ib., 429
- Collusion of Collectors of Customs with fraudulent merchants, 265, 478. Of Chancery Clerks with monkish forgers, 275
- 'Colonus,' compared with the villein regardant, 21, 428
- Combat, trial by. See Battle.
- Commerce, growth of, under the Roman Empire, 23, 429. Importance of, in the history of Crime, 66. State of English, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, 178-179, 462. Effects of, upon the distribution of the population, 180, 182, 462-463. Best knowledge of, in the Middle Ages, possessed by the Jews and Italians, 185 et seq. Influence of, in assisting the law-givers, 217. Infected by fraud at its birth, 262-263, 371-372. Influence of, upon the invention of printing, 369-370, 494-496. Opposed to private war, 370
- Commissions of Nisi Prius or Assise, Gaol Delivery, Enquiry, and Oyer and Terminer, 221, 469. Of Trailbaston, and other Special, 221-223, 469-470. Of the Peace, 222-223, 470. To enquire into the conduct of Justices and all officers, lay and ecclesiastical, under Edward III., 229, 471. Of enquiry, stayed upon restitution of stolen goods, 245, 474. Details taken from special, 242-249, 474-475
- Common, land held in, or subject to common rights. See Land.
- Common Law, origin and growth of the, 7
- Common Pleas, the Court of, a branch of the King's Court, 221

COR

- Commons, the, protests of, against ecclesiastical abuses, 343, 489. See Parliament
- Commutation. See Penance
- Compurgation, described, 55-56, 438. Its ill effects, 52, 55-56. Its relation to Trial by Jury, 56, 120-124, 438, 450-451. Its relation to the early police-system and to the guilds, 57, 61-64, 438-439, 440. Connected with Benefit of Clergy, 105, 116. Importance of the Conqueror's Laws with respect to, 121-122, 450. Becomes known, in its relation to laymen, as the Wager of Law, 123-124, 209, 450-451. How far abolished by the Assise of Clarendon, 131. Regarded as a privilege by the towns, 140, 172, 175, 459. Advantage of, to persons allowed benefit of Clergy, 299-300, 482-483
- Confederacies, 474. See Brigands, Guilds, Maintenance
- Confession, a criminal's required by Roman Law before sentence of death could be passed on him, unless all the witnesses were unanimous against him, 17, 427
- Conqueror, William the. See William
- Conquest, the Norman. See Norman Conquest
- Conservation of the Peace, provisions for the, 218-223, 469
- Conspiracy, 499. See Brigands, Confederacies, Guilds, Liveries, Maintenance, Partisanship, Retainers
- Constantine the Great, the Emperor, his laws in favour of the Provincials, 18, 427. Change of tone in the Roman Law after his accession, 19. Branding on the forehead abolished by him, 20, 428. Correction of slaves limited by him, ib. His horror of atrocities practised by barbarians, ib.
- Constitution, the history of the, contrasted with history of the people, 170-171. Principles of the, not fixed in early times, 226-227, 471. See Government, Parliament
- Contempt of Court, 257-258, 280, 412-414, 477, 479-480, 501-502
- Controlment Rolls (King's Bench) referred to, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485
- Conveyances of lands, devices to evade the laws of Mortmain and Treason in, 384-385, 498
- Copyholders, 'coloni' compared with, 21, 428. See Villeins
- 'Coram Rege' Rolls (King's Bench), referred to, 468, 470, 490, 495, 500.

COR

- Indictment of Oldcastle, Acton, and Blake, as enrolled upon the, 490-493.
 Corn, the export of, from England, alternately forbidden and permitted, 178.
 Difficulty of conveying from one part of England to another, 182
 Cornhill, the Tun on, 236, 473
 Coronation, scene at the, of Richard I., 159-160, 457-458. Massacre of Jews at the, of Richard I., 160-163, 457-458
 Coroners, first step towards the jury of the, 128. Duty of the, after sanctuary had been taken, 232, 472. Rival jurisdictions of, leading to deeds of violence at Worcester, 252-253, 475. Number of cases of felonious homicide brought to the notice of the, in 1348, 254, 475-476. Of Hampshire are required, but fail, to bring the Sheriff into the Court of King's Bench, 278, 479
 Coroners' Rolls, referred to, 476 Corporation. See Guilds
 Correction of slaves. See Slaves Corruption, general diffusion of, under Henry II., 132-133, 143-144, 451, 456. Under Edward III., and attempts to check it, 229-231, 471. More prevalent in times of ignorance than in times of enlightenment, 276. Of Sheriffs in the reign of Edward III., 277-279, 479. Of Clerks and other officers in the Court of King's Bench, 279-280, 479-480. Of Counsel in a cause, 280-281, 480. Confession of, by William Thorpe, Chief-Justice of England, 282-283, 480. General prevalence of, in the age of chivalry, 283 Corruption of blood, escaped through Benefit of Clergy in cases of Felony, 301-302, 483. Followed sentence of death in cases of Treason or Felony, 500
 'Cornsæd,' trial by the, 54, 438
 Council, torture by virtue of an Order in, 16-17, 386-388, 427, 498. The King's, before and after the Conquest, 176.
 Ordeal abolished by decree of a Lateran, 204, 467. Action of the Great, upon charges brought against William of Wykeham, 338-340, 488. Persons accused of Witchcraft brought before the Great, 359, 494. The King's, interrupted by a brawl in Westminster Hall, 412, 501-502. See Privy Council
 'Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents' (Haddan and Stubbs), referred to, 433, 434, 435
 Counsel, fees taken on both sides, and a jury-panel forged by, 280-281, 480
 Counterfeiting seals, practice of, common,

CRI

- and instances of, 269-272, 478-479.
 Forgery incomplete without, under Edward III., 272, 479
 'Counters,' the, in the City, 236, 473
 'Country,' trial by the, 206-208, 285, 467-468. See Jury County. See Sheriff, Shire
 Court, morals and habits of the, at the end of the 12th century, 142-146, 456.
 Character of the, in the reign of Edward III., and introduction of the English language at, 312-316, 485 Court-roll, extracts from a, in illustration of the Wager of Law, 450-451 Courts, the Colonial, under the Roman Empire, 22, 428-429. Of the Manor and of the Hundred, compared, 59, 439-440. Of the Shire or County compared with the Roman Colonial, 72. Origin of primitive, 82, 442. In boroughs, 83-84, 442-443. Rude constitution of, before the Conquest, 84-85, 443-444. Of the Shires, 84, 443-444. Court of the King and Witan before the Conquest, ib., 88. All, without means of determining matters of fact before the Conquest, 88. The King's Court after the Conquest, 107. Of Manors after the Conquest, 217, 218, 469. Of King's Bench, of Common Bench, or Common Pleas, and of Exchequer branches of the King's Court, 107, 221. Scenes of violence and bloodshed common in the, 213, 256-257, 412-414, 468, 477, 501. Intimidation of prosecutors and suitors in, 257-258, 468. False writs and returns successfully exhibited in, 270, 478. Confirmation of a forged charter produced in Court, 275-276, 479. Corruption of the officers of, 279-280, 479-480. Frauds practised in Secular and Ecclesiastical, 280-282, 480. Bribery of Judges in, 282-283, 480. See Jurisdiction Coventry, sack of its monastery by a bishop, 98, 447. Removal of a see to, from Chester, 99, 447. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
 Cranmer, sentiments handed down to, from the time of Wycliffe, 298
 Crécy, false personation at the battle of, 295, 482
 'Credo,' the, used as a charm, 40, 435. Repetition of, as a substitute for the penance of fasting, 47, 437 Crime, the causes of, to be sought in history, 3. Failure of the early laws of England to repress, 60-64. Importance of towns in the history of, 66. Crimes of violence checked by the peaceful arts, and increased by the

CRI

- warlike spirit, ib. Importance of the history of, in the history of religious changes, 93. Influence of a settled government in the prevention of, 94. Effect of the ancient right of private war upon, in the 14th century, 246-253. Tendencies to commit, handed down from barbarous times, 247. Of homicide in 1348, compared with the same at the present time, 253-255, 476. Of the meaner sort prevalent in times of violence, and practised by knights and brigands, 259-282, 477-480. Influence of enlightenment in checking, 266. Fostered by corrupt administration of the laws, 284. Separation of those who live by, from those who live by honest means, how caused, 286. Connexion of, with ignorance, superstition, and disease, 319. A necessary accompaniment of rebellion, 328. Imitative, compared with executions in Wat Tyler's rebellion, 336. Pride of a Chief Justice in the character of English, 388, 499. Long the most conspicuous part of public life, 403-404, 406-409, 488. The worst forms of, an inheritance from past ages, 421.
- Criminals, punishment of. See Punishment. Description of the appearance of some, 2, 425. Compassion for the children of, in Roman Laws, 19, 427-428. Facilities for the escape of, in the 14th century, 292-303, 481-482.
- Cromwell, Sir John Oldcastle compared with, 351.
- Crown, Pleas of the. See Pleas.
- Croyland Abbey, a Continuation of the History of, referred to, 496, 500, 502.
- Crusaders, attacks by, on the Jews in England, 162-163, 457-458. Conduct of the, on the march, &c., 164-165, 458. Treacheries of the, in the Second Crusade, 165-166, 458. Character of the, in the Third Crusade, 167-168, 458. Savage ordinance for the punishment of, in the Third Crusade, 168-169, 458.
- Crusades, false picture of the, in Romance, 163-164. The moral condition of Europe illustrated by the first two, 164-166. Importance to England of the third, 166-168. Remote advantages of the, 168, 172, 175-176.
- Cucking-stool, scolds upon the, 238, 255, 420, 473, 476.
- Customs, difference of local, traced to the Teutonic mode of settlement, 80.
- Customs, collectors of, in collusion with fraudulent merchants, 265, 478.

DOW

- DAGGER, the use of the, formerly common in England, 62-63, 503.
- Damages. See Appeal, Homicide.
- Danes, effect of their invasions upon punishments in England, 50. Rigorous enforcement of the law of Peace-Pledge by, 59, 63, 440. Massacre of, in England in cold blood, 62-63, 440. Massacre of, a warning not neglected by the Conqueror, 98, 447.
- Death, precautions against unjust sentence of, in the Roman Law, 17, 425.
- Decapitation, summary, by a Sheriff, under Edward I., 210, 468. A part of the punishment for Treason, 226, 470-471. By Wat Tyler's men, in imitation of public executions, 335-336, 487-488.
- Decenna. See Tithing.
- Deeds, forgery of. See Forgery.
- Default, judgment by, fraudulently obtained, 270, 478.
- Derby, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Charter to, 462.
- Despensers, the Law of Treason, and the spirit of private war illustrated by the case of the, 225, 470.
- Devil, early superstitions, concerning the, 35-38, 432. Prescriptions for expelling the, 39, 435. Superior knowledge attributed to the influence of the, 353, 493. Success of the Maid of Orleans attributed to the, 355, 493.
- Devonshire, the under-sheriff and the sheriff's officers of, excommunicated by the Bishop of Exeter, 305, 484.
- 'Dialogus de Scaccario', a passage in the, not trustworthy, 137-139, 453-455.
- Dice, loaded, in the twelfth century, 145-146, 456. Punishment for playing with loaded, in London, in the fourteenth century, 237, 473.
- Diceto, Radulfus de, referred to, 456.
- Distrain, resistance to, and rescue after, 258-259, 477.
- Dogs, lawing or expeditation of, 215, 469.
- Domesday-Book, guild-hall at Dover and guild at Canterbury mentioned in, 64, 440. Private jurisdictions mentioned in, 83, 442-443. Its importance in the history of our laws, 106-107, 449. Want of uniformity in, 173. Transcripts of, used as proof of a right to be free by villeins under Richard II., 329-330. Slaves mentioned in, 486.
- Dover, Guild-hall at, before the Norman Conquest, 64. Retention of its Roman name by, 68. Scene at, in the fourteenth century, 232. Character of the seamen of, 233-234. A journey from, to London in the fourteenth century, 234-235, 487.
- Dower, allowed to the wife of a traitor, 428.

DOZ

- Dozein. See Tithing
 Drawing, the most important part of the punishment for Treason, 225-226, 471
 Drowning, a punishment for women according to ancient laws in England, 51, 437-438. Pit for, an appurtenance of a manor, 82, 442. A privilege attached to Baynard's Castle, 83, 443
 Drunkenness, among the ancient Germans, 73, 441
 Duel, Trial by. See Battle
 Dunstable, the Chronicle of, referred to, 465
 Duress, in prison, forbidden in Roman laws, 17, 427. Common in England in the fourteenth century, 287-288, 481
 Durham, a park of the Bishop of, broken by clergymen and others, 248, 475. A collector of the Bishop of, bound to become a villein in a certain case, in the reign of Henry VI., 331, 487. Retainer engaged by the Bishop of, in spite of statutes, 397, 499
 Dufham, the Rolls of the Palatinate of, referred to, 481, 487, 498, 499
 Durham, Simeon of, referred to, 449

- EADWEARD, Eadward, Eadwerd, Edward, &c. See Edward
 Easter-Controversy, inference concerning the Christianity of Britain from, 35, 432-433
 Ecclesiastical Courts, fraudulent proceedings in, 281-282, 480
 Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, in one sense not distinct from secular according to ancient laws in England, 52. How far separated from secular in the reign of the Conqueror, 103-105, 449. Quarrel of Becket and Henry II. concerning, 115-116, 449. See Benefit of Clergy
 Eddas, the, not conclusive evidence upon superstitions in Britain, 433 Education, usefulness of, as an aid to legislation, 203, 217. One mode of operation of, in diminishing crime, 266. Frauds checked by the diffusion of, 276. Effect of, in Benefit of Clergy, 301, 481-482. State of, at the Court, and throughout England in the reign of Edward III., 312-316, 485. Prejudice against, and ill effects of the want of, at the time of Wat Tyler's rebellion, 333, 487-488. A desire for improved, associated with charges of heresy and witchcraft, 353, 493. Increase of, with the manufacture of paper, 367. Forgery not increased but diminished

ELI

- by, 368. Of books, and by punishments contrasted, 420
 Edward the Confessor, laws attributed to, 86-87, 444. Popular clamour for the laws of, after the Conquest, 97, 134. Privileges claimed by towns as having existed in the reign of, 172, 459. References to the laws of, 428, 444
 Edward I., land made liable for trade debts in his reign, 179, 462. Expulsion of the Jews in his reign, 195-198, 465. Sketch of improvements in the Law under, and under his successors, 206-231, 468-470. Preservation of his body in wax, 240, 473
 Edward II. Distribution of the population in his reign, 179-183, 462-463. The doctrine of deposition as applied to, 227, 471. Was deposed by force rather than law or right, ib. His murder an illustration of the tone of the age, 227-228. Believed to be alive after his murder, 228, 408, 471
 Edward III. Introduces a colony of Flemish weavers into England, 179. Sentence of mutilation in the reign of, 213, 468. Sketch of improvements in the laws under, 221-231, 469-470. The machinery for the administration of justice nominally almost the same in his reign as now, 221. His accession not according to any fixed legal principle, 227, 471. State of the roads in his reign, 240-241, 473. Description of the state of Society and the crimes in England under, before the Black Death, 232-321, 472-485 (the whole of Chapter IV.) Tone and education at the Court of, 312-314, 485. Adoption of the English language at the Court of, and after effects, 314-316. Manumission of villeins by, 328, 487. Dealings of, with Richard Lyons, 335, 488. Influence of Alice Perers, the mistress of, 335, 410, 488, 501
 Edward IV., accession of, and marriage of, with Elizabeth Gray, 358. Suspected of witchcraft and poisoning, 361, 494. Patron of Caxton, 364, 369-370, 496. Development of commerce in the reign of, 370, 378-380, 496-498. Goes on circuit with the judges, 415, 502
 Edward V., character of the age illustrated by the murder of, 404. False personation naturally following the murder of, 408
 'Elegit,' Estate by, according to the Statute of Westminster the Second, 179, 462
 Eleutherus, Pope, 432-433
 Elizabeth, wife of Edward IV., suspected of witchcraft, 358-360, 494

ELY

- Ely, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
- Embezzlement, a common offence of knights and officers in the fourteenth century, 261-262, 467
- Enchanters. See Witchcraft
- England, general view of society in, from the sixth century to the eleventh, 85-95, 444-446. Description of the inhabitants of, by Lanfranc, 94-95, 446. Continuity of the History of, 97. Causes of the slow development of civilisation in, 176. Distribution of the population in, under Edward II., 179-183, 462-463. General description of, in the fourteenth century, 232-321, 472-485. Aspect of the country, and difficulty of travelling in, during the fourteenth century, 241-242, 474-475. Wool the chief export of, 241. Proportion of homicides to population of, in the fourteenth century, and at the present time, 254-255, 476. Acceptance of bribes by the Chief Justice of, 282-283, 480. Causes of the prosperity of, 418. State of society in, at the end of the fifteenth century, 420-421, 503-504
- English distinguished from French or Normans in England in the reign of Henry II., and afterwards, 137-138, 453-455. No longer distinguished from French, in England, in the reign of Edward III., 313, 485. Language adopted at Court in the reign of Edward III., 313-316, 485. Character of the, according to Chief Justice Fortescue, 388, 499. Cry of 'We are betrayed,' raised by the, 401-402, 500
- Englishry (in the sense of native subjects under Norman rule), relations of, to the Normans, 96, 98-100, 137-139, 175, 447
- Englishry, the presentment of, 138, 455. Not abolished till the reign of Edward III., ib., and 313
- Enquiry, Commissions of, 221, 469-470. Particulars extracted from, 242 et seq., 474 et seq.
- Entry. Origin of the doctrine that entry upon land is necessary to possession, 81. See Forcible Entry
- Eoforwic-ceaster. See York
- Escape of criminals, facilities for, in the fourteenth century, by gaol-breaking, difficulty of identification, collusion, false and real pardons, Benefit of Clergy, etc., 292-303, 481-483
- Escheat, effect of Benefit of Clergy upon the doctrine of, 301-302, 483

FAI

- Ethelbert, laws of. See Ancient Laws and Institutes of England
- Ethelred, laws of. See Ancient Laws and Institutes of England
- 'Eulogium Historiarum,' referred to, 490
- Eusebius, evidence of prevailing superstitions from the writings of, 36, 432
- Evidence, of one witness insufficient in capital cases according to Roman Law, 17, 427. An approver's, rejected, according to Roman Law, ib. In the modern sense unknown in Pre-Norman England, 52-57, 89, 438. In the modern sense long unknown after the Norman Conquest, 123-124, 450. First indications of a desire to compare, 127-128. How far understood in the reign of Henry VI., 386-388, 498-499. See Compurgation, Jury, Ordeal, Witnesses
- Exchequer, growth of the, out of the King's Court, 107-108, 221. Importance of the rolls of the, in the History of Crime, 107-109, 449. Importance of the 'Jewry' to the, 158-159. Enquiry into the conduct of the Barons of the, 229, 479. Corruption at the, and forgery of its bills, 273-274, 479. The Great Rolls of the, see Pipe-Rolls. Madox's History of the, see Madox. See 'Jews' Rolls,' 'Pell Rolls,' Remembrancer, Treasury of Receipt, &c.
- Excommunication, sentence of, procured by fraud, 281-282, 480. Of undersheriff and sheriff's officers for execution of judgment, 305, 484
- Execution, resistance of, 257-259, 305, 477, 484. See Punishment
- Exeter, history of the name of, 67. Population of, under Edward II., 462-463. Sheriff's officers excommunicated by the Bishop of, 305, 484
- Exile, a punishment for homicide before the Conquest, 64, 440. See Abjuration
- Extortion, by justices, &c., under Henry II., 134, 143-144, 456. In the reign of Edward III., 229-231, 471. See Bribery, Corruption
- Eye, the Witch of. See Jourdemayn, Margery
- Eyres, beginning of the, in England, 108, 449. Establishment of, under Henry II., 135-137, 452-453. Intervals between the, 135-136, 452-453. Opposition to the, under Henry II. and succeeding kings, 135-137
- FABYAN, chronicle of, referred to, 494, 500
- Fairs, attacks by brigands at, 243, 474

FAL

- False weights and measures, common deceptions by, in the twelfth century, 142, 456. Punishments for, in London in the fourteenth century, 237, 473
- Falstaff, foundation for the character of, 415, 502
- Fame, the Inquest of, 285, 480
- Family, the ties of, their relation to punishments for homicide, 42, 57, 436, 438-439
- Famine an ordinary consequence of war in Kent, 235, 473
- Farmers of branches of the revenue, the Jews as, 158-159, 457. Of taxes and their misconduct, 331-332, 487-488
- Fastolf, Sir John, treachery attributed to, by Jack Cade, 415, 502
- Fees accepted by counsel from both parties to a suit, 280-281, 480
- Felons, women, receivers of, 256, 476
- Felony, forfeiture for, contrasted with some Roman laws, 19, 427-428. Maihem not a, 212, 468. Corruption of blood by, escaped through Benefit of Clergy, 301-302, 483. Standing mute upon a charge of, not equivalent to a conviction, 388, 498-499. Attainder following sentence of death in, 500
- 'Female Life in Prison,' referred to, 425
- Ferriers, Lord, or Sir Ralph, false charge against, 400, 499. Commander at Calais, 401, 499. Character of English commanders according to, ib.
- Feud. See Blood-feud
- Feudal organisation, compared with social conditions under the Empire, 20-21. Attempt of the Church to profit by, 102-104, 448-449. Effects of, in England, 103. Its relation to the Forest Laws, 213-215. Laymen not all included by the, in the reign of Edward III., 323. Affection of servants not secured by the, 414, 502
- Fine Rolls, the, referred to, 464
- Fines for homicide, among the ancient Germans and other barbarous tribes, 41-45, 436-437. Inseparable from Teutonic conquest, 44. Re-introduced into Britain by Teutonic settlers, 45. Survived the re-introduction of Christianity, 46, 437. Associated with the practice of compounding for penances, 47-48, 437. By whom paid, 57-62, 438-440. After the Conquest, 98, 107-109, 447, 449. The towns become quit of the, 171-172, 459. Abolition of the, and effects of the, upon the people, 289-290.
- Fish-ponds, abundance and value of, in the Middle Ages, 241-242, 473

FRA

- Flanders, commerce of England with, 178, 182, 462
- Fleet River, 241
- Flemings, introduced by Edward III. to teach the manufacture of cloth, 179, 462. In the stews of Southwark, 236, 473
- 'Folcland,' 78, 442. Relation of the, to the Forest Laws, 213-215, 468-469
- Forcible entry upon land or house, a capital offence according to Roman Law, 15, 426. Barbarous origin of, 81. Failure of legislation to check it, ib. Common practice of, and its relation to brigandage and other crimes in the fourteenth century, 247-253, 475. Upon rectories and churches, 304, 484. Statute against, 394, 499. Connected with private jurisdiction, retainers, liveries, &c., 395-397, 499
- 'Foreign Account Roll,' referred to, 501
- Foresters, hatred of the, 144, 456
- Forest Laws, the punishment of mutilation in the, 97. Sketch of the origin, progress, and mitigation of the, 213-215, 468-469
- Forfeiture for felony, compared with some Roman laws, 19, 427-428
- Forfeiture for treason, an incentive to false accusations, 228-229, 471
- Forgery, of charters, &c., how punished in London in the fourteenth century, 238, 473. Prevalence of in the fourteenth century, 269-276, 478-479. Of writs and returns, 270, 478. Used as an aid to brigandage, 271-272, 478. Of pardons, 272, 479. Of Exchequer Bills on a great scale, 273-274, 479. Of charters in religious houses, 275-276, 479. Common, when education is little diffused, 276. By sheriffs or their officers, 276-277, 479. By Counsel, 280-281, 480. Attributed to William of Wykeham, 339, 488. Suspicion of, attaching to the indictment of Oldecastle, 346-351, 490-493. Diminished by education, 368, 495
- Fortescue, Chief Justice, value of his work on the Laws of England, 386, 468, 498. Preferred robbery to larceny, 388, 499
- Fortresses, corrupt surrender of, 401-403, 415, 500, 502
- Franchise. See Jurisdiction
- Frank-Pledge. See Peace-Pledge
- Fraud, of various kinds, how punished in London in the fourteenth century, 237-238, 473. Knights, brigands, and 'noble savages' not incapable of, 259-260, 477. Prevalence of, in the age of 'Chivalry,' 261-262, 283, 477, 480. Commerce infected by, at its birth

FRE

- 262-263. Connexion of, with force, 263-264. Various forms of, in the fourteenth century, 264-282, 477-480. Attributed to William of Wykeham and other public men, 338-340, 488. Forms of, in the fifteenth century, 371-372, 496
- French, how long distinguished from English in England. See English, Normans
- 'French Rolls,' referred to, 497, 499
- Froissart, referred to, 487
- 'GALANAS,' equivalent to drum, 436
- Gallows, an appurtenance of a Manor, 82, 442. The New, in St. Giles's Fields, 351, 493
- Game-Laws, origin of the antipathy to, 214, 260
- Games, the Roman sentence of condemnation to the. See Arena
- Gaming, for liberty among the ancient Germans, 90, 445. With loaded dice in the twelfth century, 145-146, 456. With loaded dice in the fourteenth century, 237, 473
- Gaols, treatment of accused in, by the Romans, 17, 427. Deficiency of, in England, before the Assise of Clarendon, 130, 450. Private, of the Barons, 217-218, 469. Intimidation and torture in, in the fourteenth century, to make prisoners become approvers, 287-288, 481. A Coroner's Inquest held on all persons who died in, 288. Breaking of, and escapes by connivance of the keepers of, 292, 481. Of Bishops, 299, 332, 482-483, 487. Letters taught in to secure Benefit of Clergy for prisoners, 300-301, 483. Broken during Wat Tyler's rebellion, 333, 487
- Gaol Delivery, Justices of, 221, 469
- Gaol Delivery Rolls, referred to, 474, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485
- 'Gau,' the, compared with the shire, 72
- Gaul and Britain, alleged execution by fire in, 10-12, 429
- Gaunt, John of. See Lancaster
- Gavaston, Piers, the Law of Treason illustrated by the case of, 224-225, 470
- Gentlemen, unorthodoxy and superior learning thought disgraceful to, in the Middle Ages, 353, 493. Debt of, to towns and commerce, 373-374
- Germans, } See Teutonic
Germany, }
- Gervase, the Chronicle of, referred to, 452, 456, 457

GUI

- 'Gesta Dei per Francos,' referred to, 458
- 'Gesta Stephani Regis,' referred to, 449
- Gibbon, the historian, his name incidentally mentioned, 68
- Giles' Life and Letters of Becket, referred to, 449-450
- Glanville, description of Trial by Battle, the Grand Assise, and the Inquest of Usury by, 124-127, 451. Division of criminal jurisdiction according to, 453. Definition of 'murdrum' by, 455. The guild or commune of towns and its privileges according to, 460-461. A passage in corrected by authority of the best MS., ib. Wager of Law mentioned by, 450. The Prologue of, compared with the Proemium to Justinian's Institutes, 452
- Gloucester, history of the name of, 67. Name given by the city of, to a shire, 72. The burgesses' guild at, and charter of, 173, 459-460, 462. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
- Gloucester, a Duchess of, tried and sentenced for Witchcraft, 356-357, 494
- Gloucester, a Duke of (uncle of Richard II.), murder of, 404-406, 500. Declared guilty of Treason after death, 406, 500
- Gloucester, a Duke of, probable murder of, in the reign of Henry VI., 406, 500
- Godwin, compared with Warwick, the King-maker, 82
- Gold-workers in England before the Conquest, 65, 440
- Goods and chattels, forfeited by flight, after charge of felony, till the reign of George IV., 19, 428
- Government, value of settled, in diminishing crime, 94, 217, 419. Good, in the modern sense impossible in the Middle Ages, 109-110. No abstract theory of, existing in early times, 177, 224, 226-228. More settled under the Tudors than previously, 419
- Gracechurch, or Grascirche, scenes in the Market at, 237, 473
- Grand Assise. See Assise
- Grantham, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
- Gray, Elizabeth. See Elizabeth
- Great Seal, the, counterfeited, 273, 479. Fraudulent use of the, 368, 495
- Greece, the fine for homicide in, 42, 436
- Gregory VII., Pope, his letter to Lanfranc concerning wife-selling, 99-100, 447. Encroachments of, 104-105, 449
- Guilds, Roman 'collegia' or, 23, 429. Existence of 'collegia' or, in Roman

HAB

Britain, ib. The Guild and the Police-system according to early laws in England, 57-64, 438-440. Guilds compulsory and voluntary, ib. Trade-guilds of various kinds, 64, 440. Town corporations, ib. A guild-hall at Dover and a guild of burgesses at Canterbury before the Norman Conquest, ib. First appearance of guilds of weavers, ib. Doubtful origin of the guild-system in England, 65. Importance of town-guilds in history, ib. Recognition of ancient, or growth of new, town-guilds after the Conquest, 173-174, 459-461. Of weavers in various towns in England in the twelfth century, 178, 462. Their relation to monopolies, 184. Returns of English, to Parliamentary Writs, in 1388, 365-366, 495, 497. Gradual change in the position of members of trade-guilds, 377-380, 497-498. Social or religious in the fifteenth century compared with modern institutions, 381-383, 498

HABEAS CORPUS ACT, compared with provisions of Roman Law, 17

Haddan and Stubbs, 'Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents' of, referred to, 433, 434, 435
 Hale, Sir Matthew, a believer in witchcraft, 34. His collection of MSS. in Lincoln's Inn Library, referred to, 462, 467, 468, 471, 479, 480, 481, 483, 488, 499, 501, 502. Documents in his History of Pleas of the Crown, referred to, 468, 495
 Hales, Robert, Prior of Clerkenwell, and Treasurer of England, destruction of his house at Ighbury by Wat Tyler's men, 334. Murder of, in imitation of a public execution, 336-337, 487-488
 Hall, John, accessory and informer in the case of Gloucester's murder, 404-406, 500 Hampshire, refusal of the Sheriff of, to act in execution of judgment, 278, 479
 Hand-having thieves, punishment of, 52, 217, 438, 469
 Handmill, the Roman punishment of the, 16, 427 Hanging, forbidden by Constantine, as a barbarous punishment, 20, 428. Privilege of, claimed by lords of manors, 82-83, 442. Applied to those who failed at the Ordeal in the reign of John, 210, 467. Not escaped by standing mute in the reign of Henry III., 210, 468. A common punishment under Edward III., 213. A part of the punishment for Treason, 225-226, 470-471

HEP

 Hanse. See Guild
 Harbours. See Receivers
 Harcla, Andrew, Earl of Carlisle, the sentence passed upon, 226, 470, 471
 Hardy, Sir T. D., a remark in his Sylabus of the 'Foedera' referred to, 463 Heathendom, } Ordinances for the expulsion of in the tenth and Heathenism, } eleventh centuries, 38,
 Heathenship, } 434-435
 Height, throwing from a, forbidden by Constantine as a barbarous punishment, 20, 428. Practised in England as a punishment for women, 51, 438
 Heiresses, abduction of, 261, 477
 Hemmingford, referred to, 462
 Henry I., development of the Conqueror's policy of unification under, 107-109. Rudeness of his attempts at good government, 109-110. Cruel punishment of coiners by, 110-111, 449. References to laws attributed to, 437, 439, 444, 447, 454
 Henry II., adoption of the Conqueror's policy by, 113-114. Quarrel of, with Becket, 115-117, 449-450. His plans of legal improvement, 118-133, 450-451. Native opposition to his plans, 134-137, 452-453. Character of the Court in the reign of, 142-146, 456. Provision for the sick in the reign of, 151-153, 457. The Pope and the clergy satirised in the reign of, 315
 Henry III., opposition to the Eyres in the reign of, 135-136, 453. Responsibility of the Hundred in the reign of, 138, 453-455. Persecution of the Jews in the reign of, 188-190, 463. Caricature of Jews in the reign of, 190-191, 463-464 (frontispiece). Forest charter of, 215, 469. Provisions for the Conservation of the Peace under, 218-220, 469
 Henry IV., the peine forte et dure in the reign of, 210, 499. Policy of, with respect to Church matters, 343, 489
 Henry V., surnames in the reign of, 294, 481-482. Policy of, with respect to Church matters, 343, 489
 Henry VI., surnames in the reign of, 294, 481-482. Free-men could become villains in the reign of, 331, 487. Treatment of women in the reign of, 411, 501
 Henry VII., state of society at the accession of, 417, 420. Modern civilisation begins with the reign of, 419
 Hephaestus, the shield of, representation illustrative of the blood-fine on, 42, 436

HER

- Hereford, private jurisdictions in, before the Conquest, 83, 443. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. A clause in a charter to, 184, 461
- Heresy, punishment of, under Henry II., 131-132, 154-156, 457. Confounded with brigandage by the clergy, 156-157, 457. Regarded as a far more heinous offence than sacrilege, 309. Probable appearance of, before the Black Death, 310. The crime of, denounced by the clergy in the reign of Henry IV., 342-343. Policy of Henry IV. and Henry V. with respect to, 343. Statute against, 343, 489. Persecution and burnings for, 344-345, 489. Charges of, associated with charges of treason, 351-352, 490-493. Uncertain definition of, 352. Association of Witchcraft with, 352, 353, 355, 493. Various opinions on the legality of the punishment for, 489
- 'Heretico Comburendo,' writ de, 343-345, 489
- Hickes' 'Thesaurus,' referred to, 440, 444
- Highbury, destruction of Hales' residence at, by Wat Tyler's men, 334, 487-488
- Highways. See Roads
- Hill, John, Royal Armourer, 389. Proceedings in the 'Battle of Treason,' described by, 389-392, 499
- Holland, outrage attributed to the Prior of, 250-251, 475
- Homer's 'Iliad,' referred to, 436
- Homicide, how regarded by the Romans, 13. How regarded by the ancient Germans and other barbarous tribes, 41-46, 435-436. Teutonic origin of our early criminal law with respect to, 45, 437. Punishments for, according to ancient laws in England, 49. Responsibility incurred in cases of, by the family of the criminal, by guild, tithing, hundred, &c., 57-62. Prevalence of, before the Norman Conquest, 62-64, 440. Distinction drawn by guildsmen between justifiable, and murder, 62. Somewhat checked under the Conqueror, 98, 447. Punishment for, according to the Assise of Northampton, 131, 451. Number of instances of, in 1348, compared with the average yearly number of the present time, 253-255, 476. See Appeals, Fines
- Horace, referred to, 430, 431
- Horse, the master or keeper (Custos) of the, North of Trent, Peculation by him and his subordinates under Edward III., 261-262, 477
- Horton, offences charged against the Prior of, 247, 475

INQ

- Hospitals, fraudulent collection of alms for, in the 14th century, how punished in London, 237, 473. Of little or no avail for the sick in the 14th century, 239. Misappropriation of the revenues of, 305-306, 484
- Hoveden, Roger, referred to, 449, 451, 456, 458, 463
- Human sacrifices attributed to various tribes, 10-12, 425
- Hume the historian, his name incidentally mentioned, 68
- Hundred, nature and responsibilities of the, 57-60, 438-440. Moot or court of the, 59, 439-440. Responsibility of the, enforced by the Conqueror, with respect to murdered Frenchmen, 98, 447. The Conqueror's law with respect to the, not abolished till the reign of Edward III., 138, 455. Responsible for robberies within its limits by Statute of Winchester, 220, 469
- Hunting, a royal privilege, but granted to the citizens of London, and partially to the inhabitants of other towns, 172, 459
- Huntingdon, private jurisdictions in, before the Conquest, 83, 443. Guild of weavers at, 178, 462. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Charter to, 459
- Huntingdon, Henry of, referred to, 447

- IDENTITY of Name, difficulty of establishing in the fourteenth century, 293-294, 481. Writ of, and Statutes concerning, 294, 481-482
- Impeachment, note on the meaning of, 488
- Indictment, origin of proceeding by, 120-121, 450. When and how distinguished from the trial by petty jury, 206-207, 467. How related to appeal, ib., 289-290. Of Oldcastle as enrolled in the King's Bench and in Parliament, 346-350; the instrument in full, with the discrepancies noted, 490-493. Nature of an, in the fifteenth century, 387, 498
- Ine, King, the Laws of, referred to, 438-439, 445
- 'Infangentheof,' referred to, 82. Meaning of, 442
- Innkeepers, responsibility of, for their guests, 94, 218, 235, 446, 469, 473
- Inquest, Coroner's, compared with the Inquest of Usury, 127-128, 451. Total number of murders ascertained from verdicts on, in 1348, and compared with those of modern times, 253-255,

INQ

476. Held on all prisoners who died in gaol, 287-288
 Inquest of Fame, for persons found in suspicious possession of goods, 285, 480
 Inquisition, 'Ad quod Damnum,' extract from an, 501 Inquisition, 'Post-mortem,' referred to, 483 Intimidation of prosecutors, suitors, and jurors, 257-258, 477. Of tax-collectors, 258-259, 477
 Ipswich, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Charter to, 462
 Ireland, the fine for homicide in, 42, 436. Assassination not more prevalent in, than formerly in England, 62, 64, 440
 Isaac of Norwich, chief creditor of the Abbot and Monks of Westminster, 189.
 His wealth, and caricature of him, 190-191, 463-464 (see Frontispiece)
 Italians, the, had, with the Jews, the best knowledge of commerce in the Middle Ages, 185

JERUSALEM, conduct of the Crusaders at the capture of, 165, 458
 Jewels, great robbery of at the Royal Treasury, 199-203, 466-467
 Jewry, the, pledged to the Caursins, 193, 464. Statute of the, 194, 464 Jews, position of, in England, from the Conquest to the end of the twelfth century, 157-159, 457. Their admirable patience and tenacity, 159. Massacre of, in London, on the Coronation Day of Richard I., 160-161, 457; at York, 161-162, 457-458; at Lynn, Stamford, and Lincoln, 162-163, 457-458. Combination of clergy, barons, and traders against, 184-185. Envy excited by their superior knowledge of commerce, 185. Regulations for, under Richard I., 186, 463. Frauds and coin-clipping attributed to them, 186, 191, 463-464. Their condition in the reign of John; the Jew of Bristol and his teeth, 186-187, 463. Hostility of the clergy to, 187-188. Are compelled to wear a badge, if males, 188, 463. Pandulf's wish to expel them, 188-189, 463. Debts of the clergy to them, 189-190, 463. Caricature of, in the reign of Henry III., 190-191, 463-464, and frontispiece. Female usurers among, 191. Have rivals in the 'Pope's Money-changers,' 192, 464. Bribe the Justices, 192-193, 464. Their privileges restricted, 193, 464. Forbidden to practise usury, 194. Females as well as males compelled to

JUR

- wear a badge, ib., 464. Accused of offences against the Christian Religion, 194-195, 464-465. Two hundred and eighty hanged in London for coining, 195-196, 465. Cruelly expelled from England, 196-197, 465. Division of their property, 197-198, 465
 'Jews' Rolls,' referred to, 463, 464
 John, King, position attained by the towns in the reign of, 174-175, 459-461. Position of the Jews in the reign of, 186, 463 Jourdemayn, Margery, the Witch of Eye, accused of witchcraft, 355, 494. Again accused as an accomplice of the Duchess of Gloucester, 356, 494. Burnt in Smithfield, 358
 Judges, integrity of modern, compared with the corruption of ancient, 5, 134. Local magnates as, before and even after the introduction of the Eyres, 108. Early complaints of extortions by, 136. Corruption of, at the end of the twelfth century, 143-144, 146, 456. Enquiry into the conduct of, corruption of, and Ordinance and Oath for, under Edward III., 229-231, 471. Obstructed by armed bailiffs in their circuits, 256-257, 477. Brawls and bloodshed in their presence in Court, 213, 257, 468, 477. Deceived by false writs and returns exhibited in Court, 270, 478. Intimidation of, by armed retainers, 413, 502
 'Judicia Civitatis Londoniæ,' 439
 Jurisdiction, ecclesiastical, not distinguished from secular according to ancient laws in England, 52. Private, existed before the Norman Conquest, 59, 439. Origin of private, 82. Wide diffusion of private jurisdictions in England, 83, 442-443. Municipal, before the Conquest, 83-84, 443. Feebleness of the higher, before the Conquest, 84-87, 449. Separation of ecclesiastical from secular, in the reign of the Conqueror, 103-105, 449. Becket's quarrel with Henry II. concerning the limits of ecclesiastical, 115-116, 449-450. Of the King's Justices, and of the Sheriffs after the establishment of the Eyres, 136, 175, 453, 459. Independent, desired by the towns, 140, 175, 459. Private, at last opposed by a national sentiment, 318. Grant of private, by Richard II., 395, 499 Jury, trial by, how connected with compurgation, 56-57, 438. Origin of the Grand, 120-124, 450. Forms of, under Henry II., 124-129, 451. The descent of the Grand and of the Petty

JUS

- the same, 129. Mode of separation of the Petty from the Grand after the abolition of Ordeal, 206-208, 467-468. A common practice of sheriffs to pack a, 278-280, 479. The panel of a, destroyed, and another forged by counsel, 280-281, 480. Common sympathy of a, with an accused layman, 284-285, 480-481. Laymen commonly acquitted, and clerks commonly convicted in the fourteenth century by a, 303, 483. Prevalence and punishment of perjury in a, in the fifteenth century, 386. The Grand both witnesses and accusers in the fifteenth century, 387, 498. See Attaint, Indictment, Perjury, Witnesses
- Justice, the abstract idea of, inconceivable, in England before the Conquest, 89. Improvements in the administration of, quite recent, 419
- Justices of the Jews bribed, 192-193, 464. Of Assise and Gaol-Delivery, 221, 469. Of the Peace, their origin, 221-223, 469-470. Enquiry into the conduct of, under Edward III., 229, 471. The Ordinance and Oath of the, 230, 479. See Judges
- Justinian, alleged discovery of his 'Pandecks' at Amalfi, 133. Resemblance of the 'Proemium' of his Institutes to Glanville's Treatise, 452

KEMBLE, J. M., 'Codex Diplomaticus' of, referred to, 440, 442, 444, 479

- Kent, retention of its ancient name by, after the Teutonic invasion, 70. Appearance of the same name in that of its capital, Canterbury, ib. Population of, under Edward II., 182, 462-463. Famine in, after the siege of Calais, 235, 473
- Kent, the Earl of, ruined by Roger Mortimer, and by his own superstition, 228-229, 471
- Kidnapping, of the children of the rich, by the clergy, 342, 489
- Kin. See Family
- King, division of certain dues between him and the sheriff, 83. Treason and the claim to elect or depose a, 223-224, 226-227, 470-471. Robbers and brigands seize the property of the, or of his ministers, 244-245, 474
- King's Bench, the Court of, a branch of the original King's Court, 221. False coin sent for inspection to the Court of, 267-268, 478. False writs and returns successfully exhibited in, 270, 478. Confirmation of a forged charter

LAN

- produced in, 275-276, 479. The Chief Clerk of, accused of taking bribes, and threatened, 279, 479-480. Frauds and deceptions in the, 280, 480. Fees taken on both sides, and a jury-panel forged by a counsel in the, 280-281, 480. William Thorpe, Chief Justice of the, convicted of taking bribes, 282-283, 480. The indictment of Oldcastle as enrolled in, different from the transcripts exhibited in Parliament, 346 350, 490-493. A brawl in, 412, 501-502
- King's Council. See Council, Privy Council
- King's Court, the, Court analogous to, before the Conquest, 84. Its position after the Conquest, and subsequent divisions, 107-108. Represented in the Eyres, 132. Continuance of the traditions of the, 412, 501-502
- Kingston-on-Hull, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Maihem by the rector of, 212, 468. False accusation and fraud by the Examiner of the port of, 267-268, 478
- Knighton, the chronicle of, referred to, 485, 487
- Knights, the, of the Middle Ages, compared with the modern country gentry, 247. Acts resembling brigandage and forcible entries by, 247-252, 475. Not incapable of the meaner crimes in the Age of Chivalry, 259-262, 477. Peculation by, 265, 477-478. Compared with townsmen of the fifteenth century, 371-376, 496-497. Charges of surrendering fortresses for bribes, against, 401-402, 500. See Chivalry
- LABOURERS, provisions of the Statute of, enacted after the Black Death, 323, 486. Existence of various classes of, after the Black Death, 323-324. Discontent caused by the Statute of, 327, 487. Position of the poor after the Statute of, 341-342, 488-489. Early relation of, to capitalists, 378-380, 497-498. Excellent effects of the emancipation of, 418
- Lancaster, John, Duke of, proposal of Wat Tyler's men to make him king, 334, 488. Their grudge against him, ib. His palace, the Savoy, sacked by the rebels, 334-335, 487-488
- Lancaster, records of the Duchy of, quoted, 486
- Land, the tiller of, in the Roman provinces, 21, 428. The 'possessor' of, under the Empire, ib. Burdens on, under the Empire, 22, 428. Primitive tenure of, in common by Teutonic and other tribes, 76, 441-442. Tenure of within the 'Mark,' 77, 442. Transition from tenure of, in common, to tenure of in severalty, 77-78. Common, of two kinds in early England, 78, 442. Origin of the private holder of, in England, 78-79. Acquisition by force the first title to, 79-81. Remote source of anomalies in the tenure of, 80. Change in the tenure of, effected by the Conquest, not important in the history of Crime, 103, 448. Reluctance of the owners of, to repair roads in the fourteenth century, 241-242, 473. Relation of the first seizure of, by force, to the forcible entries of later times, to the doctrine of seisin, and to open brigandage, 247-253, 475. The holders of, indebted to the townsmen for culture, 373-376, 496-497. See Forcible Entry, Property

LAN

Lanfranc, description of the inhabitants of England by, 94-95, 446. Rebukes a Bishop for sacking a religious house, 98-99, 447. Opposes mutilation, 100, 448. Character of, 100-102, 448. Letters of, referred to, 446, 447, 448, 449

Langton, Stephen, Archbishop of Canterbury, his cruelty to the Jews, 188, 463

Larceny. See Thieves

Laws, sketch of the Roman Criminal, according to the Theodosian Code, 13-20, 426-429. Criminal, of ancient German and other barbarous tribes, 41-44, 435-436. Teutonic introduced into Britain, 45, 437. Criminal, associated with penances in England, 46-48, 437. Distinctions of class in the criminal, in England, 48-52, 437-438. Responsibility of clergy for, in England, 49. Barbarity of the early criminal, in England out of harmony with some tokens of civilisation, 76. Persistence of the same general character of, in England, for many centuries, 86-88, 444-445. Early attempts at unification of the, after the Conquest, 106-109, 449. Privileges claimed for the clergy by the canon, 116. The Wager of, how connected with compurgation and the jury, 123-124, 209, 450-451. Renewed study of the Roman Civil, 133, 452. Aversion to changes in the, and clamour for the Laws of the Confessor, 134. Sketch of the improvements in the, in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries, 118-137, 203-231, 450-453, 467-471. Shown to be less powerful than force by the events of the reign of Edward II., 224-228.

LIN

Overruled by force in the fourteenth century, 247-253, etc., 475. Brought into disrepute by corrupt administration, 284, 480. Injustice of all, a doctrine of Wat Tyler's rebels, 333, 487-488. See Jurisdiction, Legislation

'Lawful men,' the term explained, 450

Learning, associated with the suspicion of witchcraft and heresy, 353, 493

'Leechdoms,' &c., referred to 433, 435, 437

Legal forms or language, mistakes from the literal interpretation of, to be guarded against, 253-254

Legates, Papal, in England, 102, 149, 188, 448, 456, 463

Legislation, failure of, to check forcible entries, 81. Contrasted with the habits of the people in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, 203. How assisted by education, ib. Gradual effect of, upon the tone of society, 216-218. See Government, Laws

Leicester, name given to a shire by the town of, 72

Lepers, in the highway from London to Westminster, 238-239, 473. Treatment of, 239, 305.

Lèse Majesté, the earlier name of a form of High Treason, 224

Letters Patent, concerning the grant of Jews' houses in England, 465. See Patent Rolls

Lewdness, Jane Shore condemned to penance for, 362-363, 494

'Liber Albus,' referred to, 473

'Liber Assisarum,' referred to, 483

'Liber Custumarum,' referred to, 443, 459

'Liberate' Roll, referred to, 468

Liberty of the person, respect of the Romans for, 17, 427. Slight value set upon, by primitive Teutons, 90, 445. The desire for, associated with the desire for religious liberty, 418

Lichfield, a Bishop of, married before the Conquest, 102, 448

Life, respect for human; under the Roman Empire, 12-13. Among Teutonic and other barbarous tribes, 41-43, 436. In England after the Teutonic invasion, 45-52, 437. In England at the end of the twelfth century, 141, 456. In England in the fourteenth century, as compared with present times, 254-255, 476. Little known in the fifteenth century, 414, 502

Limesey, Robert de, rebuked for sacking the Monastery of Coventry, 98. Removes his see from Chester to Coventry, 99, 447

Lincoln, history of the name of, 68. Name given to a shire by the city of,

LIN

72. The twelve 'lagemanni' in, 83, 442. Outrages upon the Jews by the citizens of, 162-163, 457-458. Recognition of the ancient guild of burgesses at, and charters to, 173, 459. Guild of weavers at, 178, 462. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Alleged crucifixion at, 195, 464
 Lincolnshire, a population of, under Edward II., 182, 462-463
 Liveries, inferences from the statutes against, 318. The statutes against, long ineffectual, 396-397, 499
 Lollards, appearance of, preceded by apostasy of monks, 310, 484. Excited by the action of the higher clergy in public affairs, and the consequent scandals, 338-340, 488. Ecclesiastical and political reasons for the persecution of, 343, 489. Burning of, 344-345, 389. Writs for the arrest of, throughout the kingdom, 345, 389. Oldcastle, the most distinguished of the, 346. Persecution of, accompanied by persecution for witchcraft, 353
 London, always known by the same name from the reign of Claudius, downwards, 68, 69. 'The word 'byrig' sometimes added to it, 70. Private Jurisdiction in, 83, 443. Lawless state of, at the end of the 12th century, 141-142, 456. Massacre of Jews in, on the coronation day of Richard I., 160-161, 457. The model for other towns in charter-seeking, 171, 459. Ancient privileges of, confirmed by the Conqueror. ib. Becomes quit of the murder-fine in the reign of Henry I., ib. Retains the practice of compurgation under Henry I., 172, 459. Its citizens enjoy the privilege of hunting, 172-173, 459. Its citizens take the county of Middlesex to farm, 174. Guild of weavers in, 178, 462. Its population under Edward II., 181, 182-183, 462-463. Action of the wards of, in criminal proceedings, 199, 466. Journey to, from Dover in the fourteenth century, 234-235, 473. Approach to, by Southwark, 235-236, 473. Scenes and public punishments in, 236-238, 473. Lepers in the highway from, to Westminster, 238-239, 473. Trials sometimes removed to, from the shires, 279, 479. The apprentices of, join Wat Tyler, and behead their masters, 332, 335, 487-488. Slaughter and destruction in, during Wat Tyler's rebellion, 332-337, 487-488. Female silk-workers in, in the fifteenth century, 411-412, 501. Causes of the modern prosperity of, 418-419

MAN

London Bridge, heads of traitors on, 337, 420, 503-504. Heads of Sudbury and Hales fixed on during Wat Tyler's rebellion, 336-337, 487-488
 Lord, power of the, over his slaves, 49, 437. Origin of the Lord of the Manor, 78, 441-442. Persistence of the term, after the Conquest, 103
 Lushborough, or Luxemburg, false coin called, 267-268, 478
 Luxemburg, Jacquette of, 358-360, 494
 Lynn, Massacre of Jews at, 162, 457. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Fraudulent burial at, 296, 482. Charter to, 460
 Lyons, Richard, dealings of, with Edward III. and Alice Perers, 335, 488. Murder of, in Wat Tyler's rebellion, 336, 487-488
 Lysons, Samuel, descriptions of Roman remains in England by, 429-430

MADOX'S 'Firma Burgi,' documents in, referred to, 459, 460
 Madox's 'Formulare Anglicanum,' documents in, referred to, 486, 487
 Madox's 'History of the Exchequer,' documents in, referred to, 453, 454, 462
 Magic. See Witchcraft
 Magna Carta, struggle of classes indicated by, 176. Privileges of Jews curtailed by, 188. Common Pleas not to follow the king after, 221. Assise of Novel Disseisin according to, 453
 Maidstone, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
 Maihem, a case of, by two clergymen, 212, 468. Not a felony, ib. The appeal of, ib. Cases of, frequent in the reign of Henry IV., 414, 502. See Mutilation
 Maine, Sir Henry, 'Village Communities in the East and West,' by, referred to, 442 Maintenance, statutes against, long ineffectual, 396-397, 499. Nature and prevalence of, in the fifteenth century, 399. Alice Perers accused of, 410, 501
 Malmesbury, William of, referred to, 445
 Man, the Isle of, a Duchess of Gloucester imprisoned in, for witchcraft, 357-358, 494
 Manners. See England, Society
 Manor, Court of the, compared with the moot of the Hundred, 59, 439. 'View of Frank-pledge,' a common appurtenance of the, ib. Origin of the Lord of the, 78. Growth of the, with its common-rights, 80, 214, 441-442. Pri-

MAP

- vilages of hanging and drowning attached to a, 82-83, 442. Existence of the, in fact if not in name, before the Conquest, 103, 448. Jurisdiction of the Court of the, long jealously guarded, 217-218, 469
- Mapes, Walter, his description of the Court of Henry II., 142-144, 456. His description of the Paterine heretics, 154-155, 457
- Marches, lawless condition of the, 246, 475
- 'Mark,' the Teutonic tribe within the, 77, 442
- Markets, scenes in the, in London in the fourteenth century, 236-237, 473. Attacks by brigands at, 243, 474
- Marriage. See Abduction, Women
- Marshal, duties of the, in the Battle of Treason, 389-392, 499
- Marshalsea Prison, escape of prisoners through connivance of the Keeper of the, 292, 481. Prisoners released from by Wat Tyler's men, 333, 487-488
- Medietate Lingue*, a jury de, granted as a favour by the king before the passing of the Statute de, 268, 478
- Merchants, burglaries and outrages by, in London in the twelfth century, 141-142, 456. Escort for, under Henry III., 220, 469. Supply of arms and provisions to the enemy by English, under Edward III., 264-265, 477. Evasion of duties by, 265, 478. Importation of false coin by, 265-266, 478. Peace at home and abroad the natural desire of, 318
- Middle Ages, state of society at the end of the, 420-421
- Middlesex, the privilege of hunting throughout the county of, enjoyed by the citizens of London, 172, 459. Held to farm by the citizens of London, 174
- Middleton, offences charged against the Abbot of, 247, 473
- Military discipline, not enforced in the Middle Ages as now, 414-415, 502
- Mines; the Roman punishment of service in, 16, 20, 428. In England in the fifteenth century, 380, 497
- 'Ministers, the King's,' commonly accused of corruption, 142-146, 229, 231, 261-262, 456, 471, 477, &c. Meaning of the term in the Middle Ages, 274
- Mints, Roman, in British towns, 26. In towns in England after the Teutonic invasion, 74. Private, during Stephen's reign, 111-112, 449. Dishonesty at the authorised, 111, 268, 449, 478. Debasement of coinage at, by royal authority, 266, 478

MUT

- 'Monachi Wigorniensis Annales,' referred to, 453
- Monasteries; a theft of relics sanctioned by one, 150-151, 456. Not supporters of the poor out of their own revenues, 151-153, 457. Forgeries of charters or deeds in, with instance, 275-276, 479. Flight from, and robbery of, by monks, 308, 484-485
- Money. See Coin
- Monks, apostate, 308, 484. Robbery by, at Ramsey Abbey, ib.
- Monmouth, Geoffrey of, the founder of historical romance, 144
- Monopolies, their relation to guilds, 184
- Montfort, Simon de, 176
- 'Monumenta Ecclesiastica,' See 'Ancient Laws and Institutes of England'
- Moor, de la, his Life and Death of Edward II., referred to, 470, 471
- Morals, tone of, in England, before the Norman Conquest, 63. At the end of the twelfth century, 141-169, 456-458. In the fourteenth century, 232-320, 472-485. Of public men in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, 339-340, 350, 488-489
- More, Sir Thomas, his 'Historia Ricardi Tertii,' referred to, 494
- Mortimer, Roger, illustration of the law of Treason from his case, 227, 471. Base deception of the Earl of Kent by, 228, 471
- Mortmain, devices of the clergy to evade laws against holding land in, 384, 498
- Mosse Mokke, a Jew of Norwich, 190-191, 463-464, and frontispiece
- Municipal organisation, uncertain origin of, in English towns, 72. Uncertain extent of, before the Conquest, 83-84, 442-444. Growth of, from the Conquest to the year 1347, 170-175, 459-461
- 'Munimenta Gildhallæ Londoniensis,' referred to, 443, 459, 473, 476
- Murder. See Homicide
- 'Murdrum,' in the sense of fine for murder, see Fine. In the sense of secret slaying, see Homicide
- Mute, standing, when brought to trial; hanging after, 210, 468. The 'prison forte et dure' for, ib. Alleged miracle in prison, after, 211, 468. The 'peine forte et dure' for, 387-388, 498-499
- Mutilation, forbidden by Constantine as a barbarous custom, 20, 428. Introduced as a punishment into the early laws of England, 49-51, 437-438. Applied to transgressors against the Forest laws, 97. Opposed by Lanfranc, 100, 448. Substituted for death under the Conqueror, ib. Applied to coiners under Henry I., 111, 449; and under Henry II., 131, 451. Effects of the punishment of, upon the manners of the people, with instance, 211-213, 468. Instance of, in the reign of Edward III., 213, 468. Gradual substitution of other punishments for, 213-215, 469. By brigands in the fourteenth century, 242, 474. A common practice in the reign of Henry IV. 414, 502

NAM

NAME, writ of identity of, 294, 481-482. See Surnames Names, note on the spelling of Pre-Norman, 434
'Nativi.' See Villeins
Neckam, 'De Naturis Rerum,' referred to, 456
Neighbourhood. See Country, Indictment, Jury, Witnesses
Newark, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
Newburgh, William, referred to, 456, 457
Newcastle-on-Tyne, 'Customs of,' referred to, 461
Newgate, scenes in the Market at, 236-237, 473. Ill-treatment and torture of prisoners in the gaol of, ascertained by commission of enquiry in the fourteenth century, 287, 481
Niort, Charter to, 460
Nisi Prius, commission of, 221, 469
Norfolk, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. A forged writ in the possession of the Sheriff of, 276-277, 479
Norman Conquest, the, first effects of, 96. Exaggerated account of, by native annalists, ib., 447. Erection of castles, one of the effects of, 105. The military spirit stimulated by, 106. Unification of the kingdom partly a result of, ib. The condition of the lowest classes improved by, 324-331, 486
Normans, relations of, to the Englishry, 98-100, 447-448. How superior to the conquered, 99. Distinct from the native population in England in the reign of Henry II., and afterwards, 137-138, 453-455
Northampton, Assise of, 122, 130-133, 451. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Description of a Trial by Battle at, 205, 467. Statute of, 223, 469. Charter to, 459
Northfeld, Thomas, a Professor of Divinity, accused of witchcraft, 355, 494 Norwich, private jurisdictions in, before the Conquest, 83, 443. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Isaac and other Jews of, 190, 191, 463-464. Charges against a Bishop of, 339, 488. Guild of Saddlers and Spurriers at, 366, 495. Charter to, 459

ORD

Nottingham, Guild of weavers at, 178, 462. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Charter to, 461
Novel Disseisin, Assise of, according to Magna Carta, 453

OATES, the disposition which makes an, inherited from a past age, 4, 286 Oath, evidence to be given on, according to Roman Law, 17, 427. Of the compurgators in England before the Norman Conquest, 56, 438. Of the Justices under Edward III., 230, 471. The Justice's, violated by William Thorpe, Chief Justice of England, 283, 480
Officers, of all departments corrupt in the twelfth century, 142-146, 456. Corrupt in the fourteenth century, 274, 479. False personation of the king's, the queen's, the sheriff's, Ecclesiastical, &c., 238, 271-272, 281-282, 473, 478-479, 480
Oldcastle, Sir John, effect of an earlier state of society upon his position, 315. The most distinguished of the Lollards, 346. Suspicion attaching to the indictment of, as enrolled in the King's Bench, 346-347. Outlawry of, 347. Sentence upon, 348. Discrepancy between his indictment as enrolled in the King's Bench, and as enrolled in Parliament, 348. Question whether he suffered through a forgery, 348-350. His death not due to the clergy alone, 350. Aims of his party, 351. Compared with Cromwell, ib. The opinions and superior learning of, considered unworthy of a gentleman, 353, 493. The indictment of, at length, as enrolled in the King's Bench, with the discrepancies in the Parliamentary transcripts noted, 490-493
Ordeal, ceremonies of the, in a church, described, 53-55, 438. Effects of the, 52, 54. Enforced by the Assise of Clarendon, 120, 450. Its relation to the grand and petty juries, 131, 467-468. Persons acquitted by, compelled to abjure the realm, 131. The ceremony of, transferred from a church to a pit, 204. Abolished through the influence of the Church, ib., 467. How the petty jury became a substitute for, 206-208, 467-468
Ordinance of the Justices, the, 230, 471

ORD

- Infringement of, by William Thorpe, Chief Justice of England, and the consequences, 282-283, 480 Ordinary, refusal of clerks to plead in the absence of their, 212, 468. Meaning of delivery to the, 298. Power of the, when Benefit of Clergy was claimed, 300-301, 482-483
 Origen, evidence of prevailing superstitions from the writings of, 36, 432
 'Originalia' Roll, referred to, 465
 Orleans, the Maid of, character, career, and execution of, for heresy and witchcraft, 354-355, 493
 Orleton, 'Apologia' of Adam, referred to, 471
 Outlaws, bands of, in the twelfth century, 156-157, 457. 'Chivalers' as, in the fourteenth century, 250-251, 475. Placed on a jury to secure the conviction of an innocent man, by a Sheriff of Sussex, 279, 479
 Oxford, decision of a council at, with respect to heretics, 155, 457. Guild of weavers at, 178, 462. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Outrage, as alleged, by a Jew at, 195, 464-465. 'Scandalum' against Robert Vere, Earl of, 399, 499
 Oyer and Terminer; commission of, 221, 469

- PACATIAN, 'Vicarius Britanniarum,' 26, 29, 429, 431
 Palatine, Counties, effect of independent jurisdictions in, 396-397, 499
 Palgrave, Sir F., a document printed in his 'English Commonwealth,' referred to, 450
 'Pandects,' alleged discovery of Justinian's, at Amalfi, 133
 Pandulf, the Papal Legate, desires the expulsion of the Jews, 188-189, 463 Panels of jurors, frauds connected with, 278-279, 280-281, 479, 480
 Paper, first manufacture of linen, 365, 495. Influence of, upon the art of printing, ib. Becomes a substitute for parchment, 365-367, 495. Increase of correspondence connected with the manufacture of, 366-367, 369
 Parchment, manufacture of paper stimulated by the increasing expense of, 365-367, 495
 Pardons, practice of forging, 272, 479. Practice of transferring, 293, 481-482. Readily granted in time of war, 294, 482. Obtained by false pretences 295, 482. Petitions in Parliament against the too frequent grant of, 295-296, 482. For false burial, 296-297, 482

PAT

- Paris, Matthew, the 'Historia Major' and 'Historia Minor' of, referred to, 449, 463, 464, 465, 466, 472
 Parish relief, distribution of tithes possibly the origin of, 341
 Parks, forcible entries upon, and damage to, 347-253, 475
 Parliament, origin of, 176-177. First stage towards the representation of towns in, ib., 462. Members of, chosen with special reference to their ability to bear the fatigues and dangers of travelling, in the fourteenth century, 242. Petitions in, against the too frequent grant of pardons, 295-296, 482. Petitions in, against alien priories, 306, 484. An interpretation of Domesday Book declared false by, 330, 487. The Commons in, protest against ecclesiastical abuses, 343, 489. Sentence on Oldcastle in, 347-348, 490. Discrepancy between the indictment of Oldcastle as appearing on the Rolls of, and as enrolled in the King's Bench, 346-351, 490-493
 Parliamentary Paper, referred to, 476
 Parricide, Roman punishment for, 15, 426
 Parsons, the houses of, a common object of attack in the fourteenth century, 303, 483. Frequently accused of homicide, 307, 484. See Clergy Partisanship, the only bond holding men together in England before the Conquest, 88-89. The power which settled disputes, ib. Persistence of, among recognitors or jurors, 126-127. Attempts to counteract, 128. Its appearance among barons and burghers under Edward II., 183-184. Its effects upon the verdicts of petty jurors, 208-210. Causes intimidation of prosecutors, suitors, and jurors, 257-258. Effect of, upon the fate of approvers, 286-287. Effect of, in trials of clerks, 302-303. Connected with more charitable feelings by the guilds, 381-383. Weakened after the Wars of the Roses, 387. See Appeal, Approvers, Brigands, Family, Compurgation, Country, Guilds, Jury, Maintenance, Towns, Witnesses
 'Paston Letters,' the, referred to, 501, 502
 'Patent Rolls,' referred to, 459, 462, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 471, 474, 475, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 483, 485, 487, 488, 489, 493, 494, 499, 500, 501, 503
 Paterines, or Publicans, treatment and alleged doctrines of heretics called, 154-156, 457. Treatment of, compared with that of the Jews, 197
 'Pater Noster,' the, used as a charm, 40,

PAU

435. Repetition of, as a substitute for the penance of fasting, 47, 437
- Pauperism. See Poor, Poor-Laws
- Peace, origin of Justices of the, 218-223, 469-470
- Peace-Pledge, the institution described according to ancient laws in England, 57-60, 438-440. Its utility, 60-64, 80, 94, 440. The view of 'Frankpledge' and the manor, 59, 439. Recognised in the Assises of Clarendon and Northampton, 131, 450-452. Attempts to render it effective under Henry III., Edward I., and Edward III., 218-223, 469-470
- 'Peine forte et dure,' origin of the, in the 'prison forte et dure,' 210-211, 468. The judgment of, when and how given, 387, 498
- 'Pell Rolls,' referred to, 461, 463, 494
- Penance, imposed for the practice of Witchcraft, 38-39, 435. Commutation of, associated with the practice of compounding for homicide, 47, 437. Judgment of, see 'Peine forte et dure'
- Perers, Alice, mistress of Edward III., influence of, 335, 410, 488, 501. Accusations of maintenance against, 410, 501. Marriage of, ib.
- Perjury, caused by the practice of Compurgation, 55-57, 438. Caused by the system of Peace-Pledge, and by voluntary association in guilds, 60-62, 439-440. Prevalence of, among the early recognitors or jurors, 126-127, 451. Perpetuated after the substitution of the petty jury for ordeal, 208-210. Of jurors, both in civil and criminal trials, under Edward I., 220, 469. Following upon conviction before Justices of Traillbaston, 222, 470. Attaints of jurors for, and prevalence of, in the reign of Henry VI., 386, 498
- Pershore, fees taken from both sides in a suit between the Abbot of, and the Abbot of Westminster, 280-281, 480
- Personation, false, of law-officers, hermits, purveyors, &c., how punished in London, 238, 473. Of the Chancellor's kinsman and purveyor, 269-270, 478. Of a merchant acting for Queen Philippa, by a chaplain, 271, 478-479. Of a sheriff's officer by a brigand, 271-272, 478-479. Of Richard II. and Edward V. after their deaths, 408-409, 500-501
- Petroc, Saint, his body stolen and taken to a Breton monastery, 150-151, 456-457
- Petyt MSS., referred to, 467, 470, 501, 503
- Philippa, Queen, her money and jewels taken by brigands, 245, 474. Her

POL

- agent personated by a chaplain, one of a band of brigands, 271, 478-479. Money obtained by a forged receipt of, 272, 478-479. Refuge taken within a liberty of, by a sheriff who had refused to execute judgment, 278, 479
- Pilgrimages, to the tomb of Becket, 150, 456. To the Holy Land, 232, 472
- Pillory, punishment of the, common under Edward III., 213. Offenders to whom applied in London, 237-238, 473. Long an ordinary punishment, 420
- 'Pincerna,' a corrupt, 503
- Pipe Rolls, or Great Rolls of the Exchequer, importance of, in history, 107-108, 449. References to the, 427, 449, 451, 452, 453, 455, 456, 457, 458, 462, 498
- Piracy, prevalence of, in the Middle Ages, 233-234, 472
- Pit, for drowning women, an appurtenance of a manor, 82, 442
- 'Placita Corone,' referred to, 467, 468, 472, 473, 476
- 'Placita de Quo Warranto,' referred to, 439
- Plague, approach of, desolation caused by, and immediate after-effects of the, of 1349, 319-321, 485. Social effects of every great, 322
- Pleadings, in French after the Conquest, 312. In English, in the reign of Edward III., 313, 485
- Pleas of the Crown, under Henry II., 136, 453. Ancient privileges with respect to, claimed by the towns, 172, 459
- Pliny, referred to, 425
- 'Plowman, the Vision of Piers,' illustrated by the records of crime, 306. The author of, a young man at time of the Black Death, 309. Effects of the Black Death discernible in, 310. Quotation from, 311, 485. Useful in drawing a picture of the age, ib. Tone and language of, compared with that of Chaucer's writings, ib., and 314
- Podelicote, Richard, his confession concerning the robbery at the Royal Treasury, 200-201, 466
- Poggio Bracciolini, on the habits of the English, 496
- Pole, Michael de la, origin of, 371, 496. 'Scandalum' against, 399, 499
- Pole, William de la, charges of corruption against, and death of, 402-403, 500
- Police, early system of, in England. See Peace-Pledge
- 'Political Poems and Songs' (edited by T. Wright), referred to, 488, 489, 493, 494, 497

POL.

- Poll-tax, advocacy of a, attributed to Archbishop Sudbury, 331. Wat Tyler's rebellion following upon a, 332 et seq., 487-488
- Polycarp on the celebration of Easter, 433
- Poor, the, relation of to the clergy, before the dissolution of monasteries, 151-153, 457. Complaint of, that the tithes were diverted from their support by the appropriators of parish churches, 341, 488-489. Before and after the Black Death, 341-342. See Beggars, Labourers, Slaves, Villeins
- Poor Laws, first rudiments of the, 151-153, 341, 457, 488-489
- Pope, the, attempts of the Church to give feudal supremacy over kings to the, 102-104, 449. Resistance of the English to presentations or collations by the, 303-304, 483-484
- Population, distribution of the, in England, under Edward II., compared with that of modern times, 180-183, 462-463. Proportion of cases of homicide to, in 1348, and now, 253-255, 476
- Port-reeve, functions of the, 443-444
- Portsmouth, dockyard at, 425
- 'Possessor.' See Land
- Posting in use among the Romans, 25, 430
- Premunire, dislike of papal interference shown by the Statutes of, 303, 483
- Presentments, before the Conquest and soon afterwards, compared with those of the Grand Jury, 121, 128, 450
- Press, the torture of the. See 'Peine forte et dure'
- Prevention of Crime. See Commerce, Education, Government, Law, Punishments
- Prices, effects of the Black Death upon, 321, 485. Regulated by the Statute of Labourers, 323, 486
- Primacy of England, dispute concerning the, 148-149, 456
- Prince, the Black, his servants beaten and robbed, 245, 474. His character exceptional in the fourteenth century, 314. His instructions disregarded by the Bishop of Winchester, 339, 488
- Principle, accessory and accomplice, effects of the law of, in screening criminals, 291, 309
- Printing introduced when the belief in witchcraft was most prominent, 363. The invention of the art of, not indicative of a great stride in invention, 364. How connected with the ancient use of the seal, 364-365, 494-495. Importance of the manufacture of paper to the invention of, 365-367, 494-405. Introduced into England,

PUN

369. Importance of commerce in the history of, 369-370
- Prison. See Gaol
- 'Prison forte et dure,' character of, in the reigns of Edward I. and Edward III., 210-211, 468. Alleged miracle after sentence to, ib.
- Prisoner of war, a, becomes the booty of brigands, 244-245, 474
- Privy Council, Proceedings and Ordinances of the, referred to, 494, 498, 500
- Property, landed, under the Roman Empire, 21, 428. Recognition of personal, under the Empire, 23, 429. Possession of landed and other, by individuals, slowly recognised by Teutonic marauders, 76-80, 441-442. First title to landed, in England, 80. Increased value of, associated with the growth of towns, 374. See Land
- Prosecution. See Accusation, Appeal, Approvers, Indictment, Jury
- Provinces, Roman, their participation in the benefits of Roman Law, 18, 417
- Provisors, popular feeling shown by the Statutes of, 303, 483. Necessity for legislation against, illustrated, 304, 483-484
- Psalms, fasting commuted for, 47, 437
- Publicans or Paterines, treatment and alleged doctrines of heretics called, 154-157, 457
- Publicans, or farmers of the revenue under the Empire, the Jews in England compared with, 158
- Public men, tone of morals among, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, 339-340, 350, 403-404, 488, 500
- Public works, importance of, among the Romans, 25, 429
- Punishments, by fire in Ancient Gaul and Britain, 10-12, 425. Roman, in the Arena, 12, 426, 428. Roman, by fire, 12, 14, 34, 426, 432. Origin of the more cruel forms of, 14. Gradation of, under the Empire, 15-16, 426-427. Roman, for 'parricide,' 15, 426. Capital, original meaning of, 16. Roman, of the mines, of transportation, of the hand-mill, 16, 427. Barbarous, of mutilation, stoning, and throwing from a precipice, forbidden by Constantine, 20, 420. The same legalised in England, 49-51, 437-438. General atrocity of, according to ancient laws in England, ib. Of burning by women, 51, 438. Of mutilation under the Conqueror, 97-98, 100, 448. Under Henry I., 111, 449, and under Henry II., 131, 450. Of the first heretics in England, 156-157, "

PUR

457. Ordained for the Crusaders of the Third Crusade, 168-169, 458. Of hanging under John, 210, 467. For standing mute, 210-211, 468. Effects of cruel, upon the population, 211-213. Substitution of hanging, the pillory, and the tumbrel for mutilation, 213. Of Piers Gavaston, and of the Despensers, illustrations of the law of treason, 225, 470. Of drawing, hanging, burning the entrails, beheading, and quartering, for high treason, and the reason assigned, 226, 470-471. Of the pillory and other public, to whom applied in London, 237-238, 473. Inflicted on women, and their effect on the feminine character, 255-256, 476. Public, imitated during Wat Tyler's rebellion, 336, 487-488. Of burning for heresy, 344-345, 489. Regarded as a mode of education, 420. Purgation after successful claim of Benefit of Clergy, 298-302, 482-483. Purveyance, frauds on pretence of, 238, 269, 473, 478.

QUARTERING, a part of the punishment for treason, 225-226, 470-471. Effect of, in hardening the populace, 336, 421, 488, 503. Queen's or King's Bench. See King's Bench.

RACE, not to be treated as a determining cause of Crime in modern England, 7. How disputes concerning, should be determined, 69. Question whether the English are or are not of Teutonic race of little importance in the history of Crime, and why, 71. Rageman, Statute of, 469. Ramsey Abbey, robbery at, by monks of, 308, 484. Rape, threat of, used as an inducement to marry, 260-261, 477. Receivers of felons and stolen goods, women as, 256. Not brought into existence by great cities, 285, 480-481. Parsons of Churches as, 303, 483. Records, the Public, extracts from, not a sufficient substitute for the records themselves, 5-6. Use made of, in the 4th chapter, 307. The evidence of, used to illustrate the works of Wycliffe, the 'Plowman,' Chaucer, &c., 311. The life of the people not to be ascertained without a study of, 317. Anxiety of Wat Tyler's men to burn, 334. References to, see under the various heads. Recreancy, meaning of, 125. Alleged case of, brought before the King and Council, 205-206, 467. Rectors, accusation of brigandage, harbouring, homicide, maihem, &c., against, 211-213, 247-253, 302-304, 307, 468, 475, 483, 484. Red Book, the, of the Exchequer, 453-454. Reeve, of town, hundred, and shire, 84, 443-444. 'Reformation,' the, shown by the history of Crime to have been desired by a great part of the population, from the fourteenth century downwards, 298 et seq. Indications of the coming, in the 'apostasy' of monks, and in the writings of the 'Plowman,' Wycliffe, &c., 311. Regent, conspiracy to appoint Oldcastle, 351, 491. Relics, value set upon, in the twelfth century, 149-150, 456. Purlouning of, sanctioned by a religious house, 150-151, 456. Reliefs, an excrescence on the feudal organisation, 448. Religion, movements connected with, in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, illustrated by the history of Crime, 297-298. Carried to fanaticism by great plagues, 322. Discontent with the established among clergy and laity, after the Black Death, 329, 487. Progress and causes of discontent with the established, after Wat Tyler's rebellion, 337-342, 488-489. Discontent with, associated with political discontent, 340-342, 488-489. The struggle for freedom in, long ineffectual, 419-420. See Benefit of Clergy, Christianity, Church, Clergy. Remembrancer, King's or Queen's, records of the, referred to, 463. Repair of Roads. See Roads. Representation, growth of the principle of, 176-178, 462. How acquired by the towns, 177, 462. Importance of, in the growth of a nation, 318. Retainers, Statutes against, long ineffectual, 396-397, 499. Used to impede the course of justice in the reign of Henry VI., 413, 502. Revenue, the, of England, in 1245, 199, 465-466. Rewards to witchfinders in 1441, 356, 494. Riots, common in law-courts, in the reign of Edward III., 256-257, 477; and in the reign of Henry VI., 412, 501-502. Richard I., provisions in his reign respecting the jurors of the Hundred, 128-129, 451. His astonishment at the

RIC

RIC

- profligacy of the clergy, 146-147, 456.
 Scene at his coronation, 159-160, 457.
 Massacre of Jews on his coronation-day, 160-161, 457-458. His character, popularity, and part in the third Crusade, 166-169, 458. Progress made by townsmen in the reign of, 171-172, 459. Regulations for the Jewry in his reign, 185-186, 463
- Richard II., claim of villeins to be free, and general discontent at the accession of, 329-332, 487. Rebellion of Wat Tyler in the reign of, 332-337, 487-488. Conduct of, during the rebellion, 337. First of his line known to have signed his own name, 367. Challenge of, to the French king, 393, 499. The horrors of war described by, ib. Generous sentiments of, when a youth, 393-394, 499. Commanders bribed by the enemy in the reign of, 401-402, 500. Said to have prompted the murder of his uncle Gloucester, 404, 500. Probable murder of, 406, 500-501. Contemptible character of, in later life, 406-408, 500. Personation of, after alleged death, 408-409, 500-501
- Richard III., offer of the throne to, 360. Suggests an accusation of witchcraft against Jane Shore, 362, 494. The Age of Chivalry illustrated by the conduct of, 409. Description of society in Parliament, under, 416-417, 502-503
- Rishanger, William, referred to, 467
- Roads, burden of maintaining, under the Empire, 22, 428. Number of, in Roman Britain, 24, 429. Maintenance of, after Teutonic inroads, 75, 441. Aid of the ancient Roman, in restoring civilisation, 75, 76. State of the, in the reign of Edward II., an impediment to commerce, 182. State of the, in the reign of Edward III., 240-242, 473-474. The clergy dispute their liability to repair the, ib. Dens of robbers on, 242, 473-474. Infested by brigands, 242-243, 474. The Roman, surpassed at length by the inventions of Stephenson, 418
- Robbers, dens of, upon the highways, 242, 473-474
- Robbery, somewhat checked under the Conqueror, 98, 447. Of a monastery by a bishop, 98-99, 447. Punishment for, according to the Assise of Northampton, 131, 451. At the Royal Treasury, under Edward I., 198-202, 466-467. The hundred responsible for, if committed within its limits, 220, 469. See Brigands, Punishments
- Rochester, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463

SAN

- Rochester, chronicle of a Monk of, referred to, 467
- Rogers, J. E. T., materials in his 'History of Prices,' referred to, 467
- Roman Conquest and Culture, general view of, 8
- Roman Criminal Law, 12-20, 426-428. Native customs in Britain superseded by the, 45. See Classes, Punishments, Slaves, &c.
- Roman Civil Law, renewed study of, 133
- Roman Civilisation, indications that it flourished in Britain, 22-23, 24-30, 429-430. Its origin out of barbarism, 73-74. Its extinction in rural England, 87-88. Compared with the state of society at the end of the fifteenth century, 417
- Roman Stations in Britain, survival of names of, 67-70. It is of little importance in the history of Crime whether they were or were not the beginning of English towns, and why, 70, 71
- 'Roman Roll,' referred to, 471
- Rome, the right of appeal to, claimed by Becket, 116, 449-450
- Roses, the Wars of the, 376. Conveyances to evade forfeiture for treason during, 384-385, 498. Horrors of, 415-417, 502
- 'Rotuli Chartarum,' referred to, 457, 459, 460, 461, 462
- 'Rotuli Curie Regis,' referred to, 447, 455
- 'Rotuli Hundredorum,' referred to, 439
- 'Rotuli Parliamentorum,' referred to, 469, 470, 471, 482, 484, 485, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 496, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503
- Routiers, or Brabazons, bands of brigands, heretics, or mercenary soldiers so-called, 156-157, 457
- 'Royal Letters,' referred to, 463, 464
- Rymer's 'Fœdera,' records printed in, referred to, 459, 460, 461, 462, 465, 466, 469, 472, 480, 487, 490, 493, 494, 498
- 'SAC and Soc,' words indicating Jurisdiction, 442-443. See Jurisdiction
- Sacrilege, a common offence before the Black Death, 308-309, 484-485
- St. Albans described as a 'chester' by the Teutonic invaders, 67, 440
- Salisbury, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
- Salisbury, John of, his 'Polycraticus,' referred to, 456
- Sanctuaries, the law of, and its effects

SAU

- 232-233, 472. In Southwark, 235, 473
- Sautre, William, writ for burning, 344-345, 489. A martyr in the literal sense, 345
- Savages, thought virtuous because they cannot record their misdeeds in writing, 31. Not incapable of the meaner crimes, 259. How related to knights errant and brigands, 259-260. Customs of, the real foundation of prescription, 331
- Savigny's 'Geschichte des römischen Rechts im Mittelalter,' referred to, 437, 451
- Savoy, Palace of the, the dwelling-place of John Duke of Lancaster, 334. Burned in Wat Tyler's rebellion, 335, 487-488
- 'Saxon Leechdoms' referred to, 433, 435, 437
- 'Scandalum Magnatum,' statutes against, 398, 499. Origin of charges of, ib. Instances of, 399-400, 499
- Scarborough, manufacture of false coin and plate at, 266-267, 478
- Scokls, punishment of, in England in the Middle Ages, 238, 253, 420
- Scope of the work, 1-6
- Scotland, the Marches towards, lawless condition of, in the fourteenth century, 246, 475. Good effects of the Union in abolishing, 246
- Seals, common practice of counterfeiting, under Edward III., 269-272, 478. Imitations of Sheriffs' accepted as genuine in Courts of Law, 270, 281, 480. Counterfeit, used by brigands to obtain money, 271-272, 478-479. Counterfeiting of, formerly necessary to complete a forgery, 272. The Great Seal Counterfeited, 273, 479; and fraudulently used, 368, 495. Relation of, to the art of Printing, 364-365, and to the art of writing, 367, 495
- Searle, William, yeoman or valet of Richard II., concerned in the murder of Gloucester, 405, 408, 500-501. Said to have aided a false personation of Richard II., 408-409, 501
- Security, general sense of, in Roman Britain, 29
- Seisin, crimes of violence illustrated by the doctrine of, 81, 246-253, 475
- 'Select Charters,' referred to, 439, 450
- Senchus Mor* (Ancient Laws and Institutes of Ireland), 436
- Seneschal of the Chamber, commissioned to enquire concerning forgeries of Exchequer Bills, 273, 479
- Serjeant-at-Arms, the King's, is atro-

SLA

- ciously murdered on his journey, 245-246, 475
- Severalty, tenure of land in. See Land
- Sherborne, forcible entry, or brigandage, by the Abbot of, 247, 475
- Sheriffs, divide certain dues with the king, before the Conquest, 83. The Inquest of, and corruption of, 132-133, 451. Attempts to make them subordinate to higher judicial authority, ib. Jurisdiction of, after the establishment of the Eyres, 136, 451, 453. Corruption of, at the end of the twelfth century, 143-144, 456. Decapitation of malefactors by one of the, in the reign of Edward I., 208, 468. Robbery by one of the, under Edward III., 248, 475. Forgery by, to screen criminals, 276-277, 479. Partiality and corruption of, 277, 479. Refusal of, to act in execution of judgment, 278, 479. Juries packed by, with outlaws and other disqualified persons, 278-279, 479. Jury-panel of one of the, destroyed by a counsel, and a forged panel substituted, 280-281, 480. Connivance of, at crimes of violence, 284, 480. Neglect of, to summon jurors, 292-293, 481. Charges against, in the fifteenth century, 403, 420, 503
- Shifting Severalty. See Land
- Shipbuilding, taught to the barbarians by Romans, 31, 431
- Shires, relation of the, to the towns, 71-73. Doubtful origin of their organisation, 72. Retention of Roman names in the names of, ib. Independence of, 84. The courts of the, 84, 443-444. See Sheriffs
- Shore, Jane, accused of witchcraft, 362, 494. Found guilty of adultery and lewd behaviour, ib. Penance undergone by, 362-363, 494
- Shrewsbury, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Charter to, 462
- Sibille, Walter, charge of Scandalum Magnatum against, 399, 499
- Sick, provision for the, in the twelfth century, 151-153, 457
- Silk, employment for women in working, in the fifteenth century, 411-412, 501
- Simmel, Lambert, prototypes of, 408-409, 500-501
- Slander against nobles distinguished from slander against their inferiors, 398-399. See 'Scandalum Magnatum'
- Slavery, not first introduced into any country by the Romans, 14. Common among the Teutonic invaders, 90, 445. Cessation of wife-buying the first step towards the abolition of, 92, 93.

SLA

- Gradual extinction of, in its last form of villenage, 417-418
- Slaves, punished more severely than free-men by the Romans, 13-14, 426. Improvement in their condition after the adoption of Christianity, 19. Correction of, limited under Constantine, 20, 428. Their treatment by Romans and by barbarians contrasted, ib. Punishment of, by death and mutilation, according to ancient laws of England, 49, 437-438. Religious exercises of, restricted, ib. The most cruel punishments reserved for them and women, 50. Stoning of, 51, 438. Burning of female by female, ib. Export of, from England, before the Conquest, 89, 445. Relation of, to churls, 80-90, 445. Export of, from England forbidden by the Conqueror, 99, 445. Change of their condition into that of villeins, or that of townsmen, or that of brigands, 324-326, 486-487
- Smith, 'Toulmin, his 'English Gilds,' referred to, 461, 495, 497, 498
- Smuggling in the fourteenth century, 265-267, 478. In the fifteenth century, 372, 496
- 'Soc.' See 'Sac and Soc'
- Socage-tenure, 174
- Society, general view of, in Britain, under the Empire, 12-38, 426-432. General view of, in England from the sixth century to the eleventh, 85-95. General view of, in England, at the end of the twelfth century, 141-169, 444-446. The general tone of, stronger than a statute, 203. Gradual effect of laws upon the tone of, 216-218. General view of, in England, in the year 1348, 232-321, 472-485. Effects of every great plague upon, 322. Effects of the Black Death upon, in England, 320-323, 328-329, 486-487. New grouping of the classes of, at the end of the fifteenth century, 380, 383, 497-498. Tone of, at the end of the fifteenth century, 420-421, 503-504
- Soldiers, complaints of crimes by, in the fifteenth century, 414-415, 502
- Somerton, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Brawl before the Justices at, 257, 477
- Songs. See Political Poems and Songs
- Sorcery. See Witchcraft
- Southampton, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
- Southwark, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Approach to London by, and sanctuaries and stews in, 235, 473. The resort of criminals, 236, 473

STA

- Stafford, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
- Stamford, the twelve 'lagemanni' in, 83, 442-443. Outrage upon the Jews at, 162, 457. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463
- Star-chamber the, formerly a meeting-place of the House of Lords, 413, 502. An affray in, ib.
- 'State Trials,' error in the, 470. Not always taken from original sources, 490
- Statute, of Marlborough, 52 Henry III., c. 1 (Barons) 469
- of Westminster, the First, 3 Ed. I., c. 12 ('prison forte et dure'), 468
- — — c. 34 (Scan. Mag.), 499
- — — c. 38 (Perjury), 469
- of Rageman, 4 Ed. I., 469
- of the Jewry, Ed. I., 464
- of Bigamy, 4 Ed. I., c. 5, 483
- of Merchants, 13 Ed. I., 462
- of Westminster, the Second, 13 Ed. I., c. 18 (Elegit), 462
- — — c. 30 (Justices), 469
- of Winchester, 13 Ed. I. (Peace, &c.), 469, 473
- of 27 Ed. I., c. 3 (Justices), 469
- of 33 Ed. I. (Conspirators), 499
- of 35 Ed. I. (Papal Provisions), 483
- of Northampton, 2 Ed. III., c. 2 (Peace, &c.), 469, 470, 473
- — 14 Ed. III., St. I., c. 4 (Presentment of Englishry), 485
- — 18 Ed. III., St. 2, cc. 1 and 2 (Peace), 470
- — 18 Ed. III., St. 3, c. 2 (Benefit of Clergy), 482
- of Labourers, 23 Ed. III., St. 1, 486
- of Labourers, 25 Ed. III., St. 1, 487
- of Treasons, 25 Ed. III., St. 5, c. 2, 470
- — 25 Ed. III., St. 6, c. 4 (Benefit of Clergy), 483
- — 34 Ed. III., c. 1 (Peace), 470
- — 36 Ed. III., c. 16 (Pleadings in English), 485
- — 37 Ed. III., c. 2 ('De Idemptitate Nominis'), 481-482
- — 42 Ed. III., c. 4. (Peace), 470
- — 50 Ed. III., c. 3 (General Pardon), 488
- — 1 Ric. II., c. 6 } Transcripts of — — 2 Ric. II., St. 2, } Domesday,
c. 2 } 487
- — 1 Ric. II., c. 7 (Retainers), 499
- — 2 Ric. II., St. 1, c. 5 (Scan. Mag.), 499
- — 8 Ric. II., c. 4 (Judges), 503
- — 12 Ric. II., c. 7 (Beggars and Vagrants), 488
- — 12 Ric. II., c. 11 (Scan. Mag.), 499

STA

- Statute of 13 Ric. II., St. 1, c. 11 (Frauds in cloth), 496
 — 13 Ric. II., St. 3 (Retainers), 499
 — 13 Ric. II. (Alien Priorities), 489
 — 15 Ric. II., c. 5 (Uses), 498
 — 15 Ric. II., c. 6 (Appropriations), 488
 — 20 Ric. II., c. 1 (Retainers), 499
 — 1 Hen. IV., c. 7 (Retainers), 499
 — 2 Hen. IV., c. 3 (Papal Provisions), 489
 — 2 Hen. IV., c. 15 (Heretics), 489
 — 5 Hen. IV., c. 2 (Approvers), 498
 — 5 Hen. IV., c. 5 (Mutilation), 502
 — 5 Hen. IV., c. 13 (latten silver, &c.), 496
 — 1 Hen. V., c. 5 (of Additions), 482
 — 1 Hen. V., c. 7 (Alien Priorities), 489
 — 3 Hen. V., St. 2, cc. 6, 7 (Coinage), 496
 — 9 Hen. V., St. 1, c. 11 (Coinage), 496
 — 2 Hen. VI., c. 11 (Defective Casks), 496
 — 8 Hen. VI., cc. 22, 23 (Woollen Exports), 496
 — 9 Hen. VI., c. 4 (Names), 482
 — 15 Hen. VI., c. 5 (Perjury), 498
 — 20 Hen. VI., c. 10 (Woollen Exports), 496
 — 33 Hen. VI., c. 1 (Servants), 502
 — 33 Hen. VI., c. 5 (Silkwomen), 501
 — 3 Ed. IV., c. 4 (Imports), 497
 — 4 Ed. IV., c. 1 (Payment of workmen and Frauds in cloth), 496
 — 4 Ed. IV., c. 2 (Smuggling), 496
 — 8 Ed. IV., c. 1 (Frauds in Cloth), 496
 — 8 Ed. IV., c. 2 (Retainers), 499
 — 12 Ed. IV., c. 3 (Smuggling), 496
 — 3 Hen. VII., c. 2 (Forcible Marriage), 477
 — 27 Hen. VIII., c. 10 (Uses), 498
 — 7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 28, s. 5 (Goods and Chattels of Felons), 428
 Statutes, note on the preambles to, 503
 Stephen, King, effects of his war with Matilda, 109, 111-115, 449
 Stephenson, better roads than the Roman given to the world by, 418
 Steward, of the Chamber, commissioned to enquire concerning forgeries of Exchequer Bills, 273, 479
 Stews, the, in Southwark, 235
 Stockton, the parson of the Church of, an outlaw for homicide, 307, 484

TER

- Stoning, forbidden by Constantine as a barbarous punishment, 20, 428. Practised in England, 51, 438
 Street-ward. See Watch and Ward
 Stubbs, W., 'Select Charters' of, referred to, 439, 450
 Stuart, a, prisoner of war, and booty of robbers, 244, 474
 'Subsidy Roll,' referred to, 476
 Succession, advantages of an undisputed, 419
 Sudbury, Archbishop, made Chancellor, 331. Unpopularity of, as supposed advocate of a Poll-Tax, 331-332. Threatened with death by rebels under Wat Tyler, 332. Murder of, in imitation of a public execution for Treason, 336-337, 487-488
 Suffolk, operations of a gang of brigands in, 271-272, 478-479
 Suits, partiality of juries in, 128, 220, 451, 469. Sham proceedings in, 270, 478. Treachery of counsel in, 281-282, 480
 Summoners in ecclesiastical Courts, false personation of the, 238, 473. False personation to, 281-282, 480
 Superstition, importance of, in the history of Crime, 32-33. Character of, during the Roman period, 33-37, 431-432. Wide diffusion of similar superstitions, 37, 431-432. Effect of them upon Christianity, 35-41, 432-435. Reappearance of them after the mission of Augustine, 38, 433-435. Sacrilege not uncommon in an age of, 308-309, 484-485. Commonly associated with crime, 319. Little weakened in the fifteenth century, 343
 Surnames, not fixed, below the rank of knight, in the fourteenth century, 293-294, 481-482
 Surrey, the privilege of hunting throughout the county of, enjoyed by the citizens of London, 172, 459
 Sussex, packing of a jury by the Sheriff of, 279, 479
 Swain-mote, the, 469

- TACITUS, referred to, 425, 432, 435, 436, 441, 445
 Taxes, intimidation of collectors of, 258-259, 477. Unpopularity of the Poll, 331-332, 487-488. Misconduct of the farmers of the, ib.
 'Team,' part of the formula expressing jurisdiction, 442
 Temple, the, in London, burnt during Wat Tyler's rebellion, 334, 487-488
 Tertullian, evidence of prevailing superstitions from the writings of, 36, 432

TEU

- Teutonic origin of our Criminal Law, 7, 45, 437
- Teutonic Settlers, customs introduced by, 41, 214, 435-438. The fine for homicide always a part of those customs, 44, 435-436. Question whether they extirpated previous occupants of Southern Britain, 68-69. This question and the question whether they were the founders of our towns of little importance in the history of Crime, and why, 71, 72. Familiar with slavery in its worst form, 90, 445. Introduced the custom of wife-buying, 90-91, 445-446
- Teutonic Superstitions, not easily distinguishable in early history, 37-38, 433
- Teutonic Tribes, an aggregate of, or 'Gau,' compared with the shire, 72. Hatred of towns by, in early times, 73, 441. First acquisition of a coinage by, 74, 441. Acquisition of walls, bridges, and roads by, 75, 441. Changes in the land-tenure of, 76, 441-442. Life of, within the 'Mark,' 77, 442. Partition of land by, in England, 78-80
- Theodore, Archbishop, the Book of Penance, &c., attributed to, referred to, 434, 435, 437
- Theodosian Code, sketch of Roman Criminal Law according to the, 13-20, 426-428. Social grades according to the, 20-24, 428-429. Torture and burning for witchcraft, according to the, 34, 432. Note on the use made of the, 426
- Thieves, punishment of, according to ancient laws in England, 49-51, 437-438. Trial of, 52, 438. Slain without form of trial if caught in the act, ib.
- Thorpe, William, Chief Justice of England, acceptance of bribes confessed by, 212-283, 480
- Tiller of the soil, position of the, in the Roman provinces, 21, 428. In England before and after the Black Death, 323-329, 486-487
- Timber, forcible cutting and carrying of, 247-253, 284, 475, 480
- Tithes, share of, anciently allotted to the poor, 152. Absorbed by the Appropriators of Churches, and consequent discontent, 341, 488-489. Origin of parish relief, in the distribution of, ib.
- Tithing, nature and responsibilities of the, 58-60, 438-440
- Title, the earliest to land, 79-80, 248-249. Of the villein to be free, 331
- Title-deeds, private wars and abstraction of, 249, 475
- 'Tol,' a part of the formula indicating jurisdiction, 442

TOW

- Tonsure, when held necessary for Benefit of Clergy, 300, 483
- Tokens, Statutes against giving, long ineffectual, 396-397, 499
- Torture, use of, by the Romans, 13-14, 16, 426-427. By licence of the King of England, and by order in Council, 17, 427. Restricted by Roman Law, ib. Members of Colonial Courts exempted from, 22, 429. Of the press, &c., for the accused who stood mute, 210-211, 387, 499. By gaolers to make prisoners become approvers, 287-288, 481. How far legal in England, 387, 498-499
- Tower of London, imprisonment of a coiner in, 267, 478. Besieged by Wat Tyler's men, and the Archbishop of Canterbury dragged from it, and murdered, 336-337, 477-478. Drawing from, to the place of execution, 493. Miscellaneous Records of the, referred to, 465
- Towns, numerous in Roman Britain, 24, 429. Power of, to spread civilisation, in abeyance after the Teutonic Conquest of South Britain, 46. Guilds in, before the Norman Conquest, 64, 440. Importance of, in the history of Crime, 66. Disputed origin of, in England, 66-67. The question whether they are of Roman or Teutonic origin unimportant, and why, 67-74. Roman names of, in England, 67-70. Teutonic names of, in England, 70-71. Relation of, to the shire, 72-73. Hatred of, by the primitive Teutons, 73, 441. Private jurisdictions in, before the Conquest, 83, 442-443. Municipal jurisdictions in, before the Conquest, 83, 443. Reeve of (port-gerefa), 84, 443-444. Not all in the same condition before the Conquest, 88. Good influences of, weakened for a time by the Norman Conquest, 106. Responsibility of hosts in, 94, 131, 218, 335, 446, 469, 473. Had little power for good, even in the twelfth century, 139. Desire independent jurisdiction and compurgation, 140, 175, 459. Lawlessness and dishonesty in, in the twelfth century, 141-142, 456. Their rise in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, 170, 459. Become quit of the murder-fine, 171-172, 459. Obtain other privileges, 172-173, 459-461. Legal recognition of guilds in, 173-174, 459-461. Recover after the Conquest sooner than the rural districts, 174-175. Are in danger of reverting to the pre-Norman barbarism, 175-176. Begin to be represented in the legislative body, and how, 176-178, 462. First effects of their growing influence in England, 178-179, 462. Proportion of town to country population in the reign of Edward II., 179-180, 462-463. Relative magnitude of English, in the reign of Edward II., 181, 462-463. Persistence of the spirit of partisanship in, 183. Consequent attempt to secure monopolies in, 184. Effect of the right of private war upon, 246-247, 475. Influence of, upon landholders, 264. Growth of, before the Black Death, 316. Relative power of, increased by the Black Death, 318. Fugitive slaves or villeins in, 174-175, 324-326, 376-377, 461, 486, 497-498. Manufacture of paper and invention of printing due to the commercial spirit in, 363-366, 369, 494-496. Prejudice of knights against, and frauds in, 371-373, 496. All mental culture due to the, 373-376. Changes in the character of the trade-guilds in, 377-378, 497-498. Early relations of capital and labour in, 378-380, 497-498. The social or religious guilds in, 380-383, 498. Charges of 'Scandalum Magnatum' connected with the growth of, 398-400, 499. Growth of, favourable to women, 411-412. Affected by the lawlessness of the country, 412-413, 501-502. The greatness of England due to the, 420-421

TRA

Trailbaston, Justices of, 221, 469-470. Meaning of, 222. Justices of the Peace represent the Justices of, 222-223, 469-470

Transportation, or 'deportatio,' a Roman punishment, 16, 427. See Abjuration

Travelling, facilities for, under the Empire, 25-26, 429-430. Difficulties of, in the Middle Ages, 241-242, 473-474

Treason, all men rendered equal in the eye of the Roman law by an accusation of, 14, 426. Statute of Treasons, and previous uncertainty of the law with respect to, 223-224, 470. Illustration of the earlier views of, from the cases of Gavaston and the Despencers, 224-225, 470. The punishment for, and the reasons by which it was justified, 225-226, 470-471. Relation of, to the right of deposing a sovereign, 223-224, 226-227, 471. Charges of, commonly made from corrupt motives, 228-229, 471. Non-appearance and outlawry after indictment for, equivalent to conviction, 347, 493. Charges of, associated with charges of heresy, 350, 352, 490-493; and with charges of witchcraft, 360-361, 494. Fraudulent use of the Great Seal punished as, 368, 495. Conveyances to avoid forfeiture for, 384-385, 498. Brutalising effects of the punishment for, 421. See Attainder

USU

Treasurer, the Lord, commissioned to enquire concerning forgeries of Exchequer Bills, 273, 479

Treasury of Receipt, records of the, referred to, 466

Treasury, the Royal, robbed to the value of £100,000, 199. Proceedings against, and conviction of, Monks of Westminster for robbing, 199-202, 465-467

Trent, conduct of a parson of the Church of, 307, 484

Tresillian, Chief Justice, severity attributed to, 337

Trials, Pre-Norman (Ordeal and Compurgation), 52-57, 438. Origin of Trial by Jury, 56-57, 120-129, 206-208, 438, 450-451, 467-468. By battle introduced by the Normans, 100-101, 448. By battle according to Glanville, 124-125, 451. By battle interrupted, 204-206, 467. Proceedings in civil and criminal, in the fifteenth century, 386, 498. By battle in cases of Treason, how conducted, 389-392, 499. See Appeal, Indictment, Judges, Jury, Mute, Witnesses

'Trinoda necessitas,' 75, 441

Trokelowe, the 'Annales' of, referred to, 470

Tun, the, in Cornhill, 236, 473

Turn, the Sheriff's, intimidation at, 258, 477

Tyler, Rebellion of Wat, remote causes of, 322-329, 486-487. Beginnings of, 329-331, 387. Final outbreak of, excited by a poll-tax, 331-332. Aims of the actors in, 332-333. Bloodshed and destruction in London during, 334-335. Part taken by the London apprentices in, 332, 335. Imitation of public executions during, 336-337, 487-488. Immediate effects of, 337-338. Compared with the designs attributed to Oldcastle, 351

Tyriensis, Willermus, referred to, 458

UNION, good effect of the, with Scotland, 246

Uses, first introduced with the object of evading the law, 384, 498. Legally recognised, ib. Effects of the doctrine of, in modern times, 385

Usury, the inquest of, in the time of Glanville, 127-128, 451. The Jews allowed to practise, 185-187, 463. Sufferings of the clergy from, 188-190,

UTF

- 198, 463, 465. Practised by the Caur-sins, 192, 464-465. The Jews forbidden to practise, 194, 464.
 'Utfangenthcof,' referred to, 83

VAGRANTS, early instructions to sheriffs concerning, 131, 450-451
 Statute of 1388 against, 341, 488

'Vascon Rolls,' referred to, 462

Verdict. See Jury

'Vicarius Britanniarum,' 26, 429, 431

Vicars, offences committed by, 248, 302-304, 475, 483. Provision for, after appropriations, 340-342, 488

'View of Frank-pledge,' 437. See Peace-Pledge

Villas, numerous in Roman Britain, 26, 429-430. Description of, 26-28, 429-430

Villeins, regardant compared with the 'coloni,' 21, 428. General description of all Englishmen except the highest classes as, in the twelfth century, 139, 454. Sketch of origin and early history of, 324-326, 486. Regardant and in gross how distinguished, 326, 330. Value of, ib., 486-487. Position of, in the labour-market, 326-327. How affected by the Statute of Labourers, 327. Free labourers increased by manumission of, 327-328, 487. Refuse to do the bidding of their lords in the reign of Richard II., 329-330, 487. Refer to Domesday in proof of their freedom, ib. Legal aspect of their case, 330-331. Freeman might legally become, ib., 487. Rebellion of, 331-337, 487-488. Gradual extinction of the class of, and change in the meaning of their name, 375-380, 418

Virgins, sanctity attributed to, and sacrifice of, 11

WAGER of Battle. See Battle

Wager of Law. See Law

Wages, regulation of, by the Statute of Labourers, 323, 486. Of manufacturers paid in early times by the produce of labour, 379, 497-498

Waiving of a woman, common in cases of unsupported appeal, 290-291, 481

Wales, the fine for homicide in, 42, 436

Walsingham, Armed Retainers at the sessions of Oyer and Terminer at, 413, 502

Walsingham's 'Historia Anglicana,' referred to, 487

Wapentake, customs of the, how related to trial by jury, 120-122, 450

War, effects of, upon the Romans and the peoples they conquered, 8-9. Increase of crimes of violence through the warlike spirit, 66. War, the normal condition of society after the Teutonic invasion, 79-80. The right of private, the foundation of Teutonic and other barbarous laws, 80. Ill effects of the right of private, 81. The war-like spirit stimulated by the success of the Conqueror and by the feudal aspirations of the Church, 106. Effects of the warlike spirit shown by the crimes on the Marches, 246, 475. Effect of the right of private, in causing brigandage forcible entries, &c., in the fourteenth century, 246-253, 475. Ease with which pardons were obtained in time of, 294-296, 482. Churches and rectories seized in private, 304, 484. Private, contrasted with the occupations of townsmen, 363, 370. Effects of civil, 376, 415-417, 502-503. Private, connected with Trial by Battle, 392-393. Unsuccessful attempt to avert the horrors of, by Richard II., 393-394, 499. Relative gains of sovereigns and people in, ib.

WEL

Warbeck, Perkin, prototypes of, in earlier times, 408-409, 500-501

Warde, Thomas, personator of Richard II., 409, 500-501

Wardrobe, Bills of the office of the, forged, 273-274, 479

Wards of the City of London, juries of the, after the robbery at the Treasury, 199, 466

Warwick, the Earl of, not the first king-maker, 81-82

Warwick, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. The Prior and a monk of St. Sepulchre's, accused of homicide, 307, 484

Watch and Ward, upon the highways and at the gates, 94, 218-220, 446, 469

Water, a greater portion of England under, in the fourteenth century than in the nineteenth, 241-242, 473

Water, ordeal by. See Ordeal

Watt, beginnings and effects of the inventions of, 418

Wax, used to preserve the body of Edward I., 240, 473

Weavers, guilds of, when first mentioned, 64. Numerous guilds of, in England in the twelfth century, 178, 462. Increase of female, in London, in the fifteenth century, 411-412

Webster, gradual change in the meaning of the word, 255, 476

Weights and measures. See False Weights, &c.

Wells, population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463

WER

'Wer,' effect of the, on the character of the people, 290. Might be paid in cattle in the reign of the Conqueror, 441. See Fines, Homicide Westminster, blows exchanged at, by the clergy of the two provinces, 148-149, 456. The Abbot and monks of, in debt to the Jews, 189, 463. The Abbot of, suspected, and some monks of, convicted of robbing the Royal Treasury, 198-202, 466-467. The first, Statute of, shows perjuries of jurors, 220, 469. Lepers on the highway from London to, in the fourteenth century, 238-239, 473. Waxing the body of Edward I., in the Abbey of, 240, 473. The road impassable near, ib. Lawsuits respecting the liability of the Abbot, &c. of, to repair roads, ib., 280, 480

Westminster Hall, courts interrupted by a brawl in, 412, 501-502

Westminster, Matthew of, references to the 'Flores Historiarum' attributed to, 465

Wife-buying. See Women

Wilkins's 'Concilia,' referred to, 448, 463, 465

William the Conqueror, not the introducer of brutal punishments into England, 97. Applies old punishments to new uses, 97. His measures for the security of himself and his followers, 98, 447, 454. Forbids the export of slaves, 99, 445, 486. Resists Papal encroachments, 104, 449. Divides ecclesiastical from secular jurisdiction, ib. His policy of unification, 106-107. His policy adopted by his successor, 113-114. Importance of the laws of, with respect to Compurgation, 120, 121-123, 450. Confirms the ancient privileges of London, 171, 459. His policy afterwards reconciled with the representative principle, 178. Payments, how made in the time of, 441

William II., forest laws under, 97. His roughness unredeemed by higher aims, 110

Winchester, history of the name of, 67. Early importance of, 69. Not mentioned in Domesday Book, 83. Guild of weavers at, 178, 462. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Statute of, 220, 469. Charges against a bishop of, 338-339, 488. Charter to, 459

Witchcraft, wide-spread belief in, 33-41, 431-435. Roman belief in, and punishments for, 33-35, 432. Effects upon Christianity of the belief in, 35-41, 432-435. Belief of Sir Matthew Hale in, 34. Penances for the practice of, 38-40, 434-435. Associated with heresy in the minds of the orthodox, 352, 353, 355, 493. Prominence of, from the fifteenth to the seventeenth centuries, 352. Search for persons suspected of, in England, under Henry IV. and Henry VI., 353, 355, 493-494. Execution of the Maid of Orleans, for, 354-355, 493-494. Charge of, used as a political engine, 356. Trial, condemnation, and sentence of a Duchess of Gloucester and alleged accomplices for, 356-358, 494. Duchess of Bedford suspected of, 358-360, 494. Queen Elizabeth, wife of Edward IV., suspected of, ib. Thomas Burdett accused of, 360-361, 494. Imputed to Edward IV., according to the Bill against the Duke of Clarence, 361-362, 494. Imputed to Jane Shore, 362, 494. Prominence of the belief at the time when printing was introduced, and attempt to explain the contrast, 363 et seq. Persistence of the belief in, 420

WOM

Witena-gemot, jurisdiction of, referred to, 84, 88, 444. Constitution of, 176-177

Wite-beow (insolvent criminal), 89-90, 445

Witnesses, testimony of two at least required in capital offences, according to Roman Law, 17, 427. To give evidence on oath, ib. Common repute in the neighbourhood a substitute for, in ancient England, 124. The jury or recognitors the only, in early times, 126. First step towards the examination of, in court, 206-207, 467-468. Not known to have been distinguished from jurors, even in civil causes, before the reign of Henry VI., 208. How far distinguished from jurors in the reign of Henry VI., 386, 498. See Approvers, Compurgation, Indictment, Jury Women, position of, under the Roman Empire, 29, 430. The most atrocious punishments reserved for them and slaves, according to ancient laws in England, 50-51, 437-438. Thrown down a precipice, ib. Burnt by other women, ib. Drowned, ib. 82. Bought for wives, 90-91, 445-446. Improvement in the condition of, through the influence of the Church, 90-93. Custom of buying for wives not extinct at the time of the Conquest, 99-100. Condition of, and crimes by, in the fourteenth century, 255-256, 476-477. Waiving of, 290-291, 481. Want of sympathy for, in the age of chivalry, 290-292. Treatment and condition of, in the fifteenth century, 411, 501.

WOO

- Growth of towns favourable to, 411-412
- Woodville, Elizabeth, wife of Edward IV., 358-359. Suspected of witchcraft, 359-360, 494
- Wool, export of, from England, and its importance, 179, 241, 462
- Worcester, name given by the city of, to a shire, 72. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. A right forcibly asserted by the township of, 252-253, 475
- Worcester, Florence of, referred to, 447
- Worcestershire, a jury-panel furnished by the Sheriff of, destroyed, and a forged panel substituted, 280-281, 480
- Writing, cultivation of the art of, connected with the manufacture of paper, 366, 369, 495. Interchange of uses between scaling, stamping, or printing, and, 367, 495. Forgery not increased by diffusion of the art of, 368
- Writs, forgery of, 270, 478
- Wrongs, appeals as a remedy for private, and indictments for public, 289-290
- Wycliffe, the views held by, with respect to church-reform, widely diffused before the Black Death, 298. The writings of, illustrated by the records of crime, 306. A young man at the time of the Black Death, 309. Effects of the plague discernible in the writings of, 310. Supported by John, Duke of Lancaster, 334. Said to have thrown pearls before swine in translating the Bible, 338, 487-488
- Wykeham, William of, Bishop of Winchester, offices held by, 338, 488.

YOR

Charged with peculation and forgery, 339, 488. Excepted from a general pardon of felonies, 340, 488. Pardoned, ib.

- YARMOUTH, Great, Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. A dependency of the Cinque Ports, 234. A ship of, destroyed by the Cinque Ports men, 234, 472. Act of private war by the men of, 246-247, 475. Fraudulent burial by an inhabitant of, 296, 482. Charter to, 460
- Year and a day, Appeals need not be made before the expiration of a, 296, 482
- Year and a day, the king's, in cases of felony or treason, 302
- Year Books, state of education inferred from the, 312
- . . . References to the, 483, 485, 499
- York, history of the name of, 68, 440. Name given to a shire by the city of, 72. Claim of the Archbishop of, to the Primacy of England, 148-149, 456. Massacre of Jews at, 161-162, 457. Guild of weavers at, 178, 462. Population of, under Edward II., 181, 462-463. Rescue of prisoners by townsmen of, 257, 477. Suspicious deaths of approvers in the gaol of the castle of, 288, 481.
- Yorkshire, population of, under Edward II., 182, 462-463. Number of cases of felonious homicide in, in 1348, 254, 476

